Motors of 5 Horsepower for Silo Use

That a horsepower electric motor is very satisfactory for silo filling has been found by tests conducted this year at the University of Idaho experiment station at Caldwell.

On farms which have central station electric service available this should solve a problem which has long been a stumbling block.

Last year it was demonstrated that a horsepower motor will be successful. That was a forward step but there was still the difficulty that few farmers have the means to get into a horsepower motor.

For the 42-foot silo the total run averaged five tons-hour of cutting time, with an energy requirement of 1.2 kilowatt-hours per ton.

The lowest energy consumption in silo hours per ton was obtained with a cutter speed of 550 to 600 revolutions per minute, which just elevated the fodder without loss of power.

Three Farm Idaho Death Bodies Plan Rate Remains Get Together Low in U. S.

The first organized attempt ever made in the United States for organizations in the country to get together on a united program for relief legislation for persons in the country who are unable to support their families at a meeting in Washington, Wednesday, November 8, 1927.

Participating in the meeting were the executive committee of the National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation and the United Farm Workers of America.

The total deaths in Idaho in 1926 were 2,671, as compared with 2,307 in 1925. The number of deaths was 1,000 in 1926, as compared with 800 in 1925.

The result has been that prominent members of congress have repeatedly told the farmers to get together on a program of relief legislation and their demands would be enacted into law.

PROPOSED NEW RAIL LINE TO THIS SECTION

Ogden Newspaper Reveals Plan for Road from Devils Valley through Strevell and Burley to Here

Construction of a railroad line extending from Devils Valley on the west line of the Utah-Idaho Central railroad through Strevell and Burley into the far-famed Twin Falls district of southern Idaho, is declared to be an important possibility.

Investigations have been made by representatives of both the Utah-Idaho Central and the Denver & Rio Grande, according to those who believe that railroad will be constructed. These investigations are declared to have shown that the people of the Twin Falls and Burley sections are anxious to secure a shortened route to Ogden, the proposal that a shortened line cut off the existing route which has been a set with biggest losses.

Through the connection with the Utah-Idaho Central railroad at Devils Valley, it is expected that the passenger and freight business of the new line would be handled directly into Ogden increasing the importance of this city as a railroad terminal.

SEED POTATOES IN IDAHO Idaho stands seventh among the states in the production of potatoes this season but falls short by about 1,000,000 bushels in producing enough certified seed potatoes to plant the state for a season's crop.

This information was given recently to R. E. Shepherd, president of the Idaho State Chamber of Commerce, by E. R. Bennett, director of the Idaho extension division. Certification of seed potatoes is a new thing in Idaho in cooperation with the State Department of Agriculture. Idaho's seed potatoes are unexcelled when produced under proper conditions.

JACK DAVIS, ALIAS DIAMONDFIELD JACK

A Series of Historical Sketches and Happenings in the Early Days of Idaho

By C. S. WALGAMOTT
(Copyright, 1927, by Clifton Publishing Company)

In the spring of 1894 a young man of pleasant looks and manners rode into the Snake River valley. His figure and dress showed that he was a cowboy and about 23 or 24 years of age. He later related a story to Judge C. O. Stocklager that was probably his first attempt to get employment.

In telling this story, Davis said, "I crossed the river at Shurt's Ferry and rode to the cattle ranch of Henry Schoedde, who was running cattle on the north side of Snake river. I met Mr. Schoedde and asked if he had work for another cowboy. Mr. Schoedde says, 'What do you know about cattle?' I told him I knew all about cattle, and was an experienced cowboy. Mr. Schoedde asked if I had my own rig and bedding and when I told him that I had, he said that I could go to work in the morning. I thanked him and started to put up my horses and arranged for a place to spread my blankets, when Mr. Schoedde called to me, asking what my name was and where I was from. I shouted back that I was from Nevada and that my name was Jack Davis. Whereupon Mr. Schoedde shouted, 'You get off this ranch, you son-of-a-gun.'

"I was rather stunned by the impertinence of Mr. Schoedde and said to him, 'By the names you call me, you seem to infer that you know my folks.' And as I pulled my gun I told him I was not in the habit of taking orders of that kind from an old duffer like him, and that for a cent I would take a shot at him. Schoedde threw up his hands and says, 'Hold on a minute,' then hastily retreated to the house.

I was amused at the way he made his escape and thought he was badly scared, but very soon he reappeared with a Henry Rifle which he leveled on me with the demand to go. The distance was just right for fifty shot but too far for a six-shooter and when the first shot from his rifle cut the dust near my feet, I knew the old man meant business and the best of me. While an occasional bullet whizzed close to my head I made for cover by my stacks and closed, secured my horses and vamoosed, never again to seek employment of Mr. Schoedde."

Jack Davis was very companionable, good in his manners, extremely fond of children, and kind-hearted almost to a fault; but he was a great talker. A great deal of his talk had to do with his past exploits with his six gun. At first men in the valley thought him a great bluffer. While he was well liked for his known good qualities, it was some time before his more intimate friends concluded that he would shoot and shoot to kill if circumstances, in his opinion, justified it. He was stopping at the Stricker ranch on Rock Creek, and talked considerably of prospecting for gold and hunting diamonds, being very confident that some day he would find a diamond field and become wealthy, in all of which he was very visionary.

One day Bill Trotter, a cowboy came to the Stricker ranch and not seeing Jack Davis, says, "Where is Diamond Field Jack?" and from that on he was called Diamond Field Jack instead of Jack-Davis and he himself seemed well pleased with the nickname.

Diamond Field Jack secured employment with different cattle companies and finally, with a large company that controlled the Shoshone Basin and with ranches throughout the mountains. Sheep had already made their appearance in the country. Herders first with small bands, drove their sheep into the country, and on the ranges claimed by the cattlemen and in the fall drove their sheep out of Idaho, wintering them on the desert of Salt Lake, paying taxes, if any, in Utah. This was the cattlemen's version and hard feelings soon arose between the two lines of industries as what they termed the Mormon-sheep owners and cattlemen of other faiths.

In the vicinity of Rock creek, now in Twin Falls county, lay the seat of rich cattle industries, while around Oakley and east was the headquarters for sheepmen. When the cattlemen felt that it would be impossible for them to keep the sheep off the range, they tried to establish allotted ground where sheep might be herded and finally a dead-line was established in the Shoshone Basin east of the region between Deep Creek and Goose Creek.

For some reason, Diamond Field Jack rode this part of the range. The sheepmen claimed that he was so employed on account of his gun qualifications. At any rate he took occasion to notify sheepmen who came into the vicinity that it would be well to keep off. He acknowledged that while he was in company with one Jack Glenson, a cowboy, that they shot up the Dunn Brothers sheep camp where, however, no one was injured and Diamond Field took the honors of doing all the shooting himself.

A few days later Diamond Field called at the Dunn camp and found Oliver Dunn alone. After a friendly greeting, Diamond Field asked Dunn what the matter was with his finger he had tied up. Dunn told him that sometime before he had cut it deeply with a barbed wire and that it was giving him considerable trouble, but he could not leave his sheep to have it attended to. Whereupon Diamond Field examined the finger and found that poisoned flesh was present. He redressed the wound and the next day returned to the Dunn camp with clean clothes and medicine. For several days he made these visits and on leaving each day warned Dunn not to come any nearer Shoshone Basin with his sheep, stating that if he did, he would be made an example of.

About this time a William Tolman, a sheep man from Oakley conceived the idea of going into the Shoshone basin and securing Diamond Field out of the country. When Jack was told of Tolman's intention he expressed himself as being pleased to meet him.

Tolman was a large, resolute fellow and by no means coward. He rode into Diamond Field's camp and caught Jack unawares but in their argument Jack got the drop and shot Tolman. The wound was not fatal, and when Tolman saw that Diamond Field could not be bluffed and intended to kill him he pleaded for his life, and gained the sympathy of Diamond Field when he referred to his dependent family. Diamond Field gave him first aid and helped him into the hands of his friends.

Some sheepmen who were headed with their sheep to the restricted district, met the parties coming out with Tolman on a stretcher. This so changed their minds that they headed their sheep north and left a streak of dust as they hurriedly drove them away from the restricted district. Everything was quiet in the district until some time later when two young men, Cummings and Wilson, who were herding sheep, drove their sheep and established camp between Goose creek and Deep creek about six and one-half miles southeast of where the town of Logerson now stands, 28 miles south of the present town of Twin Falls, and some 1000 feet west of the Magic Hot Springs road where now can plainly be seen a loose rock monument intended to show the location of the wagon.

On the morning of February 4, 1896, a party passing near their camp observed the two men apparently at breakfast. They were living in a covered wagon equipped with bed and cooking outfit. Two dogs were tied to the wheels of the wagon. Twelve days later on February 18, 1896, Cummings and Wilson were found dead in their wagon, both having been shot. The dogs which were still tied to the wagon wheels, were poor and emaciated and the sheep were divided into many bands in the vicinity. Some uncooked bread was in the stove oven.

The conditions of the bodies of the men showed that they had been dead from ten days to two weeks. The body of Wilson was covered with an overcoat, that of Cummings was uncovered. Blood was found on the ground in front of the wagon, on the wagon tongue, on the front part of a wagon sheet and in the wagon. Both Wilson and Cummings had been shot with 44-caliber bullets and the face and arm of Wilson were powder-burned.

Apparently both had been wounded and Cummings had assisted Wilson into the wagon and to bed and had thrown an overcoat over him. The location of the wounds indicated that the two men had been killed by a third party. There was only one firearm in the camp when the bodies were found—a rifle that had not been used since it had been cleaned. Wilson was shot in the back and one shot struck his chin and chest passing through his right lung and through his liver. Cummings had been shot through body, the bullet cutting his intestines. The condition of Cummings' body and the nature of the wound tend to show that he had lived from one to twenty-four hours after the shooting. As many as four 44-caliber shells were found on the ground in a direct line ranging from three to twenty feet from the wagon.

This tragedy so aroused the people that great excitement prevailed and the entire effected country seemed to be raging on arms, either on the aggressive or defense. Rumors reached the cattle country of Rock creek that an uprising of the east side would invade the cattle country with the intention of destroying the entire population.

Diamond Field Jack was suspected of this crime but could not be found. Jack Glenson, the cowboy who was known to be in company with Diamond Field, was arrested and a preliminary examination was acquitted through lack of evidence.

Every effort was put forward to find Diamond Field. He was traced through Nevada, where he had told people he had been in Idaho smoking up sheep camps. Whether he was alluding to the shooting-up of the Oliver and James Dunn camp which he had acknowledged before, or whether he alluded to the Wilson-Cummings' camp, will never be known.

Archie didn't care that the note caused him great deal of trouble. She must write a note that would not require an answer; his fate would be imposed upon him by the circumstance. She thought Archibald Bennett a nice fellow and she was sorry for him, but she was not a fool. She knew that she would have to do for any one else who failed to find the way to a pleasant place for her to live. In something a little cryptic, yet something that would discourage further confidences without revealing hints, would solve the problem. Finally she hit upon those lines and copied them in her book hands.

He either fears his fate too much, Or his deserts are small, That thus he punts it to the touch: To give or lose it all.

After reading the lines aloud several times she decided that they would serve her purpose admirably. She was delighted it to Mr. Bennett immediately.

The note reached Archie just as he was leaving his sister's house. He had hoped for some revealing humor, and the state of the missive was a distinct disappointment.

He opened it eagerly, and his face fell as he pondered the verse. It was a neat, well-written slip of parchment, written in a tentative or cautious. At the dinner table she had expressed much the same thought that was contained in the verse.

Unrelied by her smile, carried a sting. Perhaps this was the thought that he sought of him, as a loser in the game of life; but he experienced a pleasant tingle in his blood when he read the lines. He felt as if he were the wrong reading and very different from the sense she meant to convey. His spirit rebuked and he decided that the line was intended to be taken unobscured and that it constituted a challenge. Archie, with a gasp, seized his head, a flash of her brown eyes.

Archie was lulled to sleep by the soothing thoughts that what she had done was to give him a commission to remove himself by strange and moving adventures.

Archie, who had been in the habit of slipping into his taxi in the night, and drove to the village drugstore for the key to the Concord house. He was just going to take and turn the key in the lock, when he saw a light on the door.

"Just go in and take your time," said the man. "Lights and keys haven't been turned out yet. If you take the house your car can stop right in. If you don't find it convenient to stop here, you can have the key—top—under the door mat."

"I guess you'll find the place all shipshape," said the driver, as they set off. "Fog came on early but didn't stay long. Left in a hurry. Family troubles, I reckon; I don't know nothing, I reckon, but there's talk all the while about her husband."

The confidences of the chauffeur only mildly interested Archie. It was unreasonably warm and the air was lifeless and humid.

"Think it will rain?" he asked the driver.

"Yep," he replied with a glance at the sea. "There's going to be a lively kick-up before morning."

Archie reached the house. He discharged the driver. In a moment he was standing in the living room that he had made his atmosphere of comfort and good taste.

Fully satisfied with his investigations, Archie picked up a book that became absorbed and read until he was aroused by a clap of thunder that seemed to shake the world. "Hurrying to the window he found that the storm had already broken; and that it would be impossible for him to catch the five-o'clock.

He turned on the lights and saw the shadow of the roof and wind-rang under the doorway. He decided that after all to spend the night in an abandoned house would be a more comfortable.

The storm showed no signs of abating and as nightfall deepened the gloom he got into making himself comfortable. He was a victim of twinges of hunger, he explored the kitchen pantry. The Concord house was a well-stocked one, and finding laces, eggs, and bread, he decided that the cooking of supper would be a jolly incident in his adventure.

While arranging the table he found a telegram under a plate that he assumed to be Mrs. Congdon's place. He hurriedly scanned his contents and he read the message:

CHAPTER III

"It was close upon midnight and the presence of a prowler on the premises caused his heart to palpitate wildly. He crept to the window and peered cautiously out, when a sound in the hall arrested his attention. He glanced the door to two jumps. He could hear the opening and closing of drawers and see the flash of an electric light as the intruder slipped swiftly about. Then through the vast silence of the house he heard a faint, low-voiced voice to his anger and disappointment.

"Well, I'll be damned!"

A series of quick flashes on the wall gave warning of the intruder's invasion of the upper rooms. Archie threw back the door and his lightning and emerald eyes glared at the intruder. He was immensely gratifying to him when he saw the heart of the intruder beating quickly, his pulse was regular.

The thief had become more cautious and was light-footed. He slipped carpeted treads of the stair, still sending occasionally a bar of light down the wall where he was creeping. Archie could hear him sliding down the hall as though he were slipping on a soap suds.

He turned out the lights, and placed the key under the door mat, stole through the garden. The man he had shot down might even now be lying dead in his path, and he would have to be careful not to stumble over the corpse. But more appalling was the thought that he might be lying in an ambush, and he carried his pistol before him at arm's length just as he stepped out.
