The Oregon Short Line and Frank Plafied found more real men in the state of Idaho than they expected this week and the debt received from the action of the League of Commercial Clubs should prove a wholesome lesson.

Governor Frank R. Gooding has raised himself in the estimation of a good many of his political enemies by the manner in which he has shown thick and thin for the central of the railroads of this state by a railroad commission and it was due to a great extent to his efforts that the League of Commercial Clubs endorsed a public utilities and railroad commission at its last session in Nampa.

Some of the papers of the state are already beginning to go after James H. Brady, the governor-elect, about the party platform and his statements concerning what the legislature will do. The Times is ready to give even the devil his due and for that reason if for no other, proposes to wait and give both the governor and the legislature the benefit of the doubt.

While the male quartette of the Coeur d'Alene Jubilee Singers were singing one of their selections last Saturday evening some here in the audience had the lack of courtesy to hiss and by so doing showed his relationship to the goose. Nearly every one present spoke in highest praise of the whole entertainment and just what aroused the antagonism of the man in the audience is a puzzle.

The first victory in the battle between the railroad and the people of this state was gained by the people when the League of Southern Idaho Commercial Clubs voted to work and push for a legislative act creating a Public Utilities and Railroad Commission in this state.

A bird's-eye view of the country, pieced together from the news columns of last week's papers, affords a picture which is altogether inspiring, even though its outline here and there may waver with a suspicion of mirage. It is a picture of all industries shaking off their lethargy of past year, of factories and mills beginning to give way to full time, of new enterprises springing into life, of capital casting off its burden of fear, and of the unemployed trooping to employment.

rivers diverted and in many cases beautiful scenery destroyed to create individual wealth the people of this state should see to it that these things which are the people's assets should bring in a revenue to the state and to see further that in no case where such utilities are placed in the hands of the individual that such power is used to the undoing of the people.

LABOR AND THE COURTS IN AUSTRALIA

The Australian labor press, speaking, it may be supposed, for a great mass of Australian wage-earners, is up in arms against the federal high court of the commonwealth. It demands such an immediate and radical change in the commonwealth constitution as shall deprive the judiciary of its supreme authority and transfer it to the hand of the legislature.

not for a moment doubted, remarks the Brooklyn Standard Union (Rep.) this passion for empiricism, for the advocacy of overnight experiments in business and government methods, leave to use a homely simile, a growth of kousaleesh to the industrial world.

Since it was upon the issue of property that the Republicans won, remarks the Atlanta Constitution (Dem.) it rests with them to make performance square with promise—to belt up the wheels of industry and to provide work for the unemployed.

Mr. Taft, speaking in Cincinnati, referred to his preselection predictions of a business revival in the following words: "I am very hopeful that the predictions made by me in my essays in regard to the business future of the country may come true."

"I feel that this is entirely consistent with the maintaining and clinching of the Roosevelt policies as I understand them and as you understand them; that is, that the laws are to be enforced and that business men are to be shown the lines of legality."

Among the indications furnished by the news columns of the press that Mr. Taft has no monopoly of confidence in the situation are such items as the resumption of full time in the thread mills in New Jersey; a 20-per-cent wage increase in several Pittsburgh factories; increased orders for steel rails; a stimulation of activity in the building, dry-goods and grocery trades; and the restoration of the higher wages which prevailed before the panic.

Central has ordered 400 convertible cars, and the Santa Fe has ordered 5,000 tons of steel for bridge and viaduct construction.

In a Boston dispatch to the New York Tribune we read: "Representatives of the thirty-eight steamboat companies of the United States and Canada which comprise the Association of Steamboat Passenger Lines held a secret meeting in Boston today and rescinded the plan to reduce wages and cut expenses on all of the lines."

"This view finds endorsement in the Philadelphia Railway World, which rejoices in the Republican victory, but nevertheless warns railway officials that it is a victory for a radical candidate running on a radical platform. This leading railway organ goes on to say: "In view of this outlook the railroads commissions will continue their encroachments upon the field of private enterprise in transportation, and the railroads must resist this movement or it will damage them beyond the possibility of speedy recovery. They must bind the interests of their employees as closely as possible to the interests of the owners and creditors; they must continue their policy of frank publicity; they must frown upon any schemes of financial jugglery which are certain to arouse public hostility. They must continue the work which has been so auspiciously begun through the trade associations, of cultivating friendly relations with shippers, with a view to the removal of misunderstandings and the correction of abuses. They must assiduously abstain from the very appearance of evil in the direction of attempting to influence, by means which critical persons might consider improper, the action of state or national legislatures. Above all, the railroads must, during the next four years, if they would improve their position before the bar of public opinion, obey to the letter the laws which have been passed for their regulation. Many of these laws are unconstitutional and will be thrown out by the courts. In the meantime, however, it is highly expedient that they should be scrupulously obeyed."

should in no degree relax their efforts to form a united organization for the defense of their interests. They may be certain that as yet the justice of their position is by no means understood either by the masses of the people or by their lenders. The connection between the prosperity of the railroads and the prosperity of the country is by no means perceived outside of a limited circle of business men. The agitation for railway valuation as a basis for railway rates will continue; the interstate commerce commission will make demands for additional powers; the state legislatures and state great Pittsburgh industrial belt, and it is said that the United States Steel corporation expects to make the year 1909 "the biggest in the history of iron and steel." Says The Iron Trade Review: "The railroads are showing more activity. The Northern Pacific has specified 12,000 tons of rails to the Lackawanna Steel company, while the Rock Island has specified on 5,000 to be rolled by the Illinois company. The Missouri Pacific has placed an order with the American Car and Foundry company for the repair of 6,000 freight and 75 passenger cars. The Illinois

Representatives from every seaport and every inland steamship center reported a big increase of business." Among many rose statements coming from men eminent in the business world may be cited those of President J. T. Harahan, of the Illinois Central railroad, and of James E. Smith, president of the St. Louis Business Men's League. According to Mr. Harahan, Mr. Taft's election "means a certain increase in all lines of business, beginning at once"; and Mr. Smith predicts that within the next six months "St. Louis will enjoy the greatest prosperity within its history," and that pride and self respect, even the spiritual respect for the High God, cannot hold me when this one anchor holds. She said that I might see her. I have waited a long time. I have taken my fighting chance again, and I've won so far."

He looked up at Plank, curiously embarrassed.
"Your body is normal; your intelligence wholesome, balanced, sane, and I want to ask you if you think that perhaps without understanding how I have found in her or through her in some way the spiritual source that I think might help me to help myself?"
"You ask me if I believe it possible that she can be the medium?"
"Yes."
"Plank said deliberately. "Yes, I do think so."
The silence was again broken by Plank: "Sward, you have asked me what I think. Now you must listen to the end. If you believed that through her—her love, nurturing her—you stood the best chance in the world to win out, it would be cowardly to ask her to take the risk. As much as I care for you I had rather see you lose the fight than accept such a risk from her. Now you know what I think, but you don't know all. Sward, I say to you that if you are man enough to take her, take her! And I say that of the two risks she is running today, the chance she might take with you is infinitely the lesser risk, for with you, if you continue slowly losing your fight, the mental suffering only will be hers. But if she closes this bargain with Quarrier, it will be to him her body, the light will go out of her soul forever."

He rose, striding the length of the room once or twice, turned, holding out his hand.
"Goody," he said. "Harrington is about due at my office. Quarrier will probably turn up tonight. I am not vindictive, I shall be just with them as just as I know how, which will be as merciful as I dare be. Goody, Sward!"
"When he had gone Sward lay back in his chair, very still, eyes closed. A faint color had mounted to his face and remained there.
It was late in the afternoon when he went downstairs, using his crutches lightly. Gumbie handed him a straw hat and opened the door, and Sward cautiously descended the stoop, stood for a few moments on the sidewalk, looking up at the blue sky, then whistled and slowly made his way toward Washington square. The avenue was deserted. His own house appeared to be the only remaining house still open in all that old fashioned but respectable quarter.
A cab driven smartly passed through the park, the horses' feet stamping the asphalt till the echoes rattled back from the marble arch. He followed it idly with his eyes up Fifth avenue, saw it suddenly halt in the middle of the street, saw a woman spring out, stand for a moment talking to her companion, then turn and look toward the square.
She stood so long and she was so far away that he present day could not be watching her. A dozen ragged arches were propping around the fountain, casting sidelong glances at a distant policeman. But it was not too long that evening to permit the children to splash in the water and the policeman drove them off.
"Poor little devil!" said Sward to himself and he rose, adjusted his crutches and started down the street with a vague idea of seeing what could be done.
As he limped toward the sun level in his eyes, he heard somebody speak behind him, but did not catch the words or apply the hall to himself. Then, "Mr. Sward!"
"Come the low, breathless voice at his elbow.
His heart stopped as he did. The sun had dazzled his eyes, and when he turned on his crutches he could not see clearly for a second. That past, he looked at Sylvia, looked at her outstretched hand, took it mechanically, still staring at her with only a dazed unbelief in his eyes.
"It is in love for a day," she said. "Lila Mortimer and I were driving uptown from the bank when we saw you, and the next thing that happened was me, on Fifth avenue, running after you—no, the next thing was my flying leap from the banister and my standing there looking down the street and across the square where you sat. Then Lila told me I was probably crazy, and I immediately confirmed her diagnosis by running after you."
She stood laughing, flushed, sun-burned and breathless, her left hand still in his, her right hand laid over it. "Oh," she said, with a sudden change to anxiety, "does it tire you to stand?"
"No, I was going to saunter along."
"May I saunter with you for a moment? I mean—I only mean, I am glad to see you."
"Do you think I am going to let you go now?" he asked, astonished.
She looked at him; then her eyes evaded his. "Let us walk a little," she said, withdrawing her hand, "if you will walk with me."
"Strong! Look, Sylvia!" and he stood unsupported by his crutches, then walked a little way, slowly, but quite firmly. "I am rather a coward about my foot, that is all, I shall not lug those things about after today."

"Did the doctor say you might?"
"Yes, after today, I could walk home now without them. I could do a good many things I couldn't do a few minutes ago. Isn't that curious?"
"Very," she said, avoiding his eyes.
He laughed. She dared not look at him. The excitement and impetus of sheer impulse had carried her this far. Now all the sadness of it was clutching in at her throat, and for awhile she could not speak—sinking there in her dainty summer gown beside him, the very incarnation of youth and health, with the sea tan on wrist and hand, and he, white, hollow eyed, crippled, limping at her elbow.

Yet at that very moment his whole frame seemed to glow and his heart clamored with the courage left it, for he was thinking of Plank's words, and he knew Plank had spoken the truth. She could not give herself to Quarrier if he stopped her, this was the stronger will, after all; his was the right to interfere, to stop her, to check her, to take her, draw her back—as he had once driven her from the fascination of destruction when she had averaged out too far over the cliffs at Snotover.

"I came in with Lilla. We're asked to Lenox for the week's end. We go to Stockbridge on the early train tomorrow morning," she said.
"I'm not going to let you go yet," said Sward.
"If I took to my heels here in the park, would you chase me, Stephen?" she asked, with mock anxiety.
"Yes, and if I couldn't run fast enough I'd call that policeman. Now, do you begin to understand?"
"Oh, I've always understood that you were spoiled. I'm partly guilty of the spoiling process too. Listen, I'll walk with you a little way,"—she looked at him—"a little way," she continued gently; "then I must go. There is only a caretaker in our house, and Lilla will be furious if I let her tell all alone.—Besides, we're going to dine there, and it will be very very if I don't give a few orders first."
"But you brought your maid."
"Naturally."
"Then telephone her that you and Lilla are dining out."
"Where, silly? Do you want us to dine somewhere with you?"
"Want you? You've got to!"
"Stephen, it isn't best."
"It is best."
She turned to him impulsively. "Oh, I do want to so much! Do you think I might? It is perfectly delicious to see you again."
"Yes, I have," he said sternly.
They turned, walking past the fountain toward Fifth avenue again. Furtively she glanced at his hands, with the city pullover on them, as they grasped the crossbars of the crutches, then looked up at his worn face. He was much thinner, but now in the softly fading light the shadows under the eyes and cheek bones seemed less sharp, his face fuller and more boyish; the contour of head and shoulders, the short, crisp hair were as she remembered, and the old charm held her, the old fascination grew, tightening her throat, stealing through every vein, stirring her pulses, awakening imperceptibly once more the best in her.
"There is no use," she said under her breath. "I can't get back to Lilla. Stephen, the dreadful part of it is that I—I wish she were in Jericho! I wish the whole world were in Ballyhoos and you and I alone once more!"
Under their gay laughter quivered the undertone of excitement, Sylvia said:
"I'd like to talk to you all alone. It won't do, of course. But I may say what I'd like, mayn't I? What time is it? If I'd think with you we'd go to have Lilla for convention's sake if not from motives of sheer decency, which you and I seem to lack, Stephen."

"We lack decency," said Sward, "and we're proud of it. As for Lilla, I'm going to arrange for her very simply, but very beautifully. Plank will take care of her. Sylvia, there's not a soul in town, and we can be as independent as we please."
"No, we can't. Agatha's at the Santa Regina. She comes down with us."
