EXTRAORDINARY

It gives me great pleasure to announce that I have fitted over 2000 people with glasses in Twin Falls since 1910. Many of these people have been fitted time and again, without results, until they came to me.

My success is due to the fact that I have made a special study of the eye and done nothing but optical work exclusively, for the past 17 years.

My work speaks for itself.

My prices are the very lowest for first-class work.

If you are in need of optical work, don't fail to consult me.

W. J. MORAN, Box 98.

On the evening of the fourth day after the arrival of the momentous telegram at the Haines ranch a staid passenger alighted from a lumbering local train at Rockvale station. The passenger was a heavily built, sharp-featured man of middle age, who looked as far from home in his excellent clothes as the clothes looked far from home in Rockvale. He made an inquiry of a man on the platform, and, carrying a heavy suitcase, eluded the man's eyes and disappeared with the unmistakable gait of Hicks. "Hans Dalton's place was the one the man had directed him to, and Hicks, after catching the best horses to the house, for seventy-five cents, scrubbed a little of the dust of travel from his person and went down to the dining room. The drink of whiskey he got made even his trained throat wobble, and he strolled over to the poker table to join a group of rain-soaked, plainly-armed spectators of high play. From the conversation he picked up the news of the robbery. He learned that the man at Rock Vale was washed out; that Case Egan, a noted rancher, was in jail for shooting a deputy sheriff, and that Hal Haines was requesting a "millionaire's son" visitor from New York. "When I see he an' I drawed one of the players," "Tomorra's express," "Since when did the express stop at Rockvale?" "Since the president of the road told it to stop for this here young person," replied the informant crushingly. Hicks was scanning the faces of the men about him with a purposeful eye. Especially he watched one—a lean man in red shirt and leather breeches, bearded and spurred, who stood near the table. Hicks approached him. "Hello, Patton," he said. The man whirled so sharply that the revolver he had drawn in whirling caught in Hicks' coat and jerked him into the middle of the room. The poker game went off without a sound or sign of interruption. The bartender took a casual glance at Hicks and the gambler, then went on talking to a customer as before. "Hello, Hicks," said Patton, putting up the gun. "I'm much obliged that I didn't shoot you. We don't greet old friends quite so hearty out here, boy as you do in New York—especially when we haven't heard our right names in a year or two." "How long have you been here, Pat?" asked Hicks. "Eighteen—twelve years ever since that friend of yours, Mr. Owen, paid me $10,000 for getting rid of a certain—what he called, a certain obstacle."

"Where they goin' now?" "Heck, I don't know. That is, the girl's going. What I haven't found out yet is whether Harry goes, too. If he stays here, I'll stay, and you'll go."

"After Pauline?" "Ahead of her?" "And then what?" "That you'll have to use your own judgment. It is an 'out-of-the-way' place on the edge of the mountains. You'll find some able-bodied men and a few of 'em, but they'll help you out a price. Of course, what we want is to get her hidden, and kept hidden. Don't get excited, Hicks, and kill her." "Hicks, we must be after them—because one of them will soon be after us."

"Yes, you'll be here at the same time and Patton set up a quartered out into the bathroom, returning presently with three men of his own brand—broad-brimmed, crumpled, sufficient to meet any sort of country—three of Case Egan's cut-throats. The lean gunman held his head back and guffawed. "It's none of my business, but you ain't mine. It topped her whiplash rapidly. His old acquaintance drew back with suspicion. "But no foolin' this time," warned Hicks. "My own money in advance." He produced $100 in bills from his trouser pocket, but accepted it quickly as a matter of course. "Oh, come now, just one little thing. She'll think she's the one that's the boss that was carried off in the mountains—the one that I told her about. I tell you I will not hear a word of it. She may be ill or something; it would scare her to death." "I'll ask her if she'll let me before I let her go. She's certainly had never liked me, but she's certainly had never liked me."
