KILLING FOREIGNERS IN MEXICO

Such disquieting developments in Mexico City as "the killing of McManus, the American, with the result to the American flag that had been raised to protect him, the murder of a Swedish subject, the killing of five Scandinavians, and the looting of the homes of French, British and German subjects" have, according to one Washington correspondent led army and navy officers, respect, Ed. McManus' intervention may be forced on the United States any day. And similar conclusions are expressed in many editorial columns. But Mr. John R. Sullivan, an administration agent with Carranza told the Vera Cruz newspaper men: "You can say that it is completely certain that the Washington government is not prepared to effect any armed intervention in Mexico. And there is President Wilson's declaration to White House cables on the same day to the effect that the murderers of John B. McManus will be adequately punished, and full reparation made by Villa and Zapata. When the Brazilian minister demanded redress of General Salazar, the Zapata commander in the capital, he was met with fair promises of investigation and punishment. General Villa's declaration in a signed statement for the press: 'I will insist that, if such a crime against the Republic has been committed, the man or men responsible be brought before me and punished as such traitors deserve.' Perhaps even more hopeful to the fact that last week, after the evacuation of Mexico City by General Obregon and his co-operators by one of Zapata's generals, the American minister, Mr. Wood, returned to the city and set up the substance of a joint government, with the supposed backing of both Villa and Zapata. An agreement was made with the Carranzistas at Vera Cruz, whereby the Vera Cruz-Mexico railroad was to be kept open to allow the exit of foreigners from the capital and the influx of food and supplies. In Yucatan where Carranza's blockade order gave the state department a diminutive imitation of its great profanity across the Atlantic, the President's change of mind and the press-

one of American warships at Progreso, stillled the fears of foreign residents and released cargoes of the steamship, without which hinder twice could not be made to the shores of our next summer's wheat crop. McManey, the McManus murder, is being discussed in our press, as a contemptuous and typical instance of the sort of thing that foreigners in Mexico have been experiencing or living in constant fear of during these months of revolution and counter-revolution. Press accounts, based on such-part of the Brazilian minister's report as was given out at the state department, say that on the morning of the 11th, when the Zapataists soldiers entered Mexico City, a party went straight to the home of Mr. McManus, a wealthy and prominent American living in the outskirts of the city. The United States flag was flying over the door, and the house had been under the control of the Brazilian soldiers. It is not known who fired the first shot, but papers know of no disagreement about the fact that the soldiers went with hostile intent, and it is generally understood that the motive was revenge for the death of several of their fellows killed in a raid on the McManus home during their previous occupancy of the city. After the encounter of the 11th, as the New York Sun reports: "McManus" had been found with bullet holes, while his body was literally shot to pieces, indicating that the Mexicans had fired into it even after he was dead. Whether McManus killed any of the attacking party or not is not stated."

LETTER WRITTEN TO HIS SISTER IN CHICAGO

Mr. McManus told his sister what he thought of the powers existent in both Mexico and Washington. This letter reads as quoted in part in a Chicago dispatch to the New York Sun: "I am afraid that the present outfit will not last long in power. They will simply remain here in Mexico City until they accumulate a few millions in the treasury, then they will depart, leaving the city with no military protection. This will permit the Zapataists to start sacking the town, and experience has shown that they respect no foreign flag. I have a large American flag on a staff over the doorway, and it is no more respected than a dunnage. I am ashamed to acknowledge it."

The boys are the least and the matter and surely some scheme can be devised to procure a wagon. Last Monday the old horse which Miss Ford drove in from City over morning to school, got scared and ran away. His straggling tail in great shape, the harness was in the hands of a horse man. The horse was out of commission also. About a dozen business men met in the cafeteria Tuesday night and gave to their homes, each feeling that reason marked a pleasant event in their lives.

HUDSON 6-40 THE PATTERN CAR

Without doubt one of the chief reasons for the popularity of the Hudson Light Six is the phenomenal record that the Hudson has made with 10,000 Hudson Light Sixes in the hands of automobile owners throughout the United States.

When I say that the Hudson Light Six Forty is the pattern-car of its class, I mean that it is the model from which practically all other Light Sixes are copied.

The Light Six of today is a much better car than the one that was produced in the fall of 1913, although that was at its time in advance of anything yet on the market.

THE PERILS OF PAULINE

Written By Charles Goddard

SYNOPSIS

Stanford Marvin, wealthy manufacturer of automobiles, has worn himself out by overwork. His son Harry, and his adopted daughter, Pauline, have each other in mind to marry after two years of thrilling adventures before marrying. Her reason is that she is ambitious to be a writer. Old Mr. Marvin asks to see what she has written. While Pauline and Harry are in search of a magazine containing her first story, Mr. Marvin opens the envelope of a mummy that received from Raymond Owen, his rascally private secretary, helps lift off the front of the case, but leaves old Mr. Marvin to remove the mummy's bandages alone. Marvin during a fainting spell, sees the half-rotted mummy come to life, leap out of her case and crawl from the wall and try to force it into his hands, while her lips reveal a strange message from the remote past. Restored to consciousness by Harry and Pauline, the old man believes it all a dream, until, later, he finds the identical bracelet on the mummy's skeleton wrist. He promises Pauline, one year to see life and places her in the guardianship of Owen. A final black stroke kills him. Pauline writes on the doctor's prescription pad a very brief and simple will. Then she dies. A lawyer tells Owen that he would have to invent the name of Pauline's vast estate if something should happen to her before she marries. He goes to see a doctor, and Owen conspires to kill Pauline. Owen and Harry have dealt with the many efforts of the two to accomplish this.

CHAPTER XXXI

A venerable white-haired man accompanied Harry Marvin from his motor to the library, where Pauline was reading.

"Oh, Dr. Laroux! This is indeed an honor!" she cried brightly, rising and extending to him both her hands.

"No, no," answered in a deep, gentle voice, "and a delight to see the little girl who used to break into my medicine case and spill all my pills."

Pauline laughed. Dr. Laroux had been not only the family physician, but the dear friend of her father and, before the death of old Mr. Marvin, a frequent guest.

But of late years he had given up the practice of medicine. For the study of the human body had become a work of art through his remarkable discoveries in germs.

"Dr. Laroux is going up to the lodge with me," said Harry. "That is, he's going to his place up there and I'm going to mine."

"No, I met Lucille today and commanded her to come out here and see that you did nothing foolish in my absence. She said she would come, but that she couldn't do the rest."

"Does Miss Polly still spill all the pills?" inquired Dr. Laroux, smiling.

"She does," said Harry with deep meaning.

"Luncheon is served, Miss Marvin," announced Betty.

"And what fearful new germs have you discovered, Doctor?" asked Pauline, as they seated themselves at the table.

The scientist's fine face brightened with enthusiasm. "I have discovered not only a new germ but a new method of how to cure people here suffering probably since the beginning of the world, but which was never diagnosed."

He paused and arose briefly to greet Raymond Owen, who had just entered.

"A new disease, were you saying, doctor?" inquired the secretary with interest.

"Yes; the disease of drowning. I have given it the name of hydrophilic."

"You always made fun of me! I think you are joking now," said Pauline in resentment.

"I assure you, Miss Polly, I am deeply serious. I have found the cause of nearly all the deaths by drowning, and we have been ignorant enough to call suicidal. Persons who, moved by a seeming impulse, leap into lakes or ponds or the sea are afflicted not with hydrophilic, but with a subtle sickness. They do not seek death; they seek relief from agony. And the sickness is caused by germs that I have found. I have also found the antidote, and I am to present the entire subject before the Medical Society within a few weeks."

"But, doctor, how could you BEGIN to discover such a thing? What made you suspect that such a disease existed?" inquired Harry.

"The peculiarly increasing number of drownings here in New York," said Pauline, "mean apparently suicidal drownings. I have always, as you know, been a student of psychology, of the brain—not only the individual brain, but the brain en masse, so to speak—the mental condition of the community, of the race. There was no cause to explain why there should be an increase in the number of deaths by other means."

"But the germs how could you get the germs?" asked Pauline leaning forward with eager interest.

"That is hardly a matter for table talk," answered the doctor who said, "Oh, yes it is, dear doctor. I haven't any nerves."

"Only crazy nerve," interpolated Harry.

"Owen—make him be still. Doctor, please tell me."

"I found the germs by examining the brains of three persons who had drowned themselves."

"How perfectly wonderful!"

"Not merely logical. I knew them my last after discovering what killed the people, to find out what would kill the germs. And I have done so."

"It is an act just splendid," she cried, extending her hand in impetuous congratulation.

"Not those. They are very precious and they are not to be sold. I will honor me by a visit at any time I will try to find some harmless ones."

"It would be rather stupid. About an attack I should say as Harry and you are going to be up in the mountains. What a thrilling life! Alone in the wilderness—hunting, fishing, going out now and then to kill some deer and that ought not to be killed."

"It is the only to kill them. Miss Pauline," said the doctor.

"Well, maybe they don't like to be killed any more than we do," she retorted. "I know what will happen. Harry will be calling for me to come up and share his work."

"I shall do nothing of the kind. I am seeking a rest, not only from work but from your quarrels. Well, then, if you catch the 3:20, we'll have to go home."

"I am sure that Maxwell has packed everything you need," said Pauline. "Oh, don't bother, Polly."

"Oh, yes; I am going to prove that I am devoted to you, even though you desert me for a hunting lodge."

"She sped off the stairs and Harry, extending himself to the doctor, followed.

Dr. Laroux and Owen moved out to the veranda.

"The way doctor," said the secretary, with a laboriously-puff at his cigar. "I should like to have a word with you, about a young man, a friend of mine who is out of work. I would not desert you, because, but in the meantime and honest. Could you, by any chance, make a place for him in your laboratory?"

"Why, I believe I could. It just happens that one of my assistants left two weeks ago. The position is not a great one, but there might be promotion. What is your friend's name?"

"Lopez, Balhazar."

"I will see him any afternoon. I shall be up in the mountains for only three days at the most, but I shall return there next week. If he will call in the interim."

"I will appreciate your kindness as much as his," said Owen earnestly.

Pauline and Harry joined them. Owen and she escorted the traveller to the door, and waved farewell as they sped down the drive.

Dr. Laroux, who had devoted a lifetime to the welfare of mankind, was engaged in his work. He engaged his assistant Balhazar with perfect confidence in Owen's recommendation.

Early, however, he began to doubt the ability and training of his new assistant. It was on the afternoon of the second day after Balhazar had been engaged that the doctor found him examining through a microscope a specimen of hydrophilic in his engaging test tube.

"The kindly scientist's temper was stirred for the first time in many years. He approached Balhazar in fury.

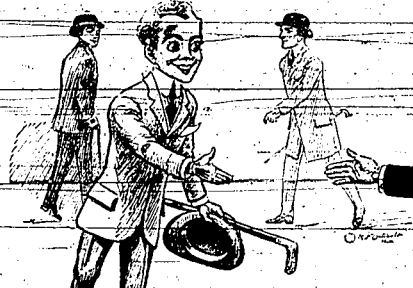

"Do you not know," he demanded "that you are meddling with death?"

"I humbly say your pardon, Dr. Laroux," pleaded Balhazar. "I was fascinated by the discovery you have made. I knew that I did wrong to touch so precious a substance, but I could not resist the temptation."

"I do not rebuke you; I warn you. To open that tube for the first time unless you are protected in the way that only I know how to protect myself. The loss of the germs would be nothing to you, but it would be a disaster to me. You must open nothing in my laboratory without consulting me."

"I shall obey implicitly."

"I understand your curiosity. I hope I have not been offensive; hasty in my speech," said the kindly doctor, with an retreating smile, "and tonight I will leave you in charge of the place."

THOSE YOU MEET, JUDGE YOU FIRST BY THE CLOTHES YOU WEAR

The one most necessary thing a man must do is dress well. When you go to get a position, if you are not well dressed, the man you approach for work will say, "I'm sorry, but we really haven't a place for you."

If you have a position, and want to get a raise in salary, raise the standard of your appearance. Looking prosperous will help you to prosper.

"It is an honor and a sacred trust," said Balhazar.

"The doctor shook his hand as he left the room."

"Within a minute, Balhazar was at the bacteria case. He opened the glass door, swiftly scanned the labels on the test tubes, found the one he wanted, lifted it out and thrust it into his pocket."

He was at the Marvin house an hour later. Raymond Owen met him.

"Did you get it?" asked the secretary. "They were waiting behind the building and the night was pitch dark."

"Yes," answered Balhazar, "but be careful, Master. Dr. Laroux warned me that it is deadly."

"Spengemann, Germs in any liquid are not deadly," Balhazar said. "But you have done splendidly."

"We shall win yet, master."

"I hope so."

Balhazar handed the test tube to Owen, who placed it, a little tremulously in his pocket.

"How about Savelle?" asked the secretary.

"He is there at the Weatherly home—house as I said, but I thought best to have you talk with him at the first. We can see him now."

"No; I must meet Miss Marvin's agent. A touring car was awaiting on the drive and, at the busy command of Owen, Balhazar vanished into the shrubbery behind the garage."

"I shall be here in two hours," he whispered as he fled.

Raymond Owen stepped out to greet Lucille, Courtney and smiling he helped her from her hat.

"I have come to take your place and said with minute solemnity. "It seems" to me a pity that a guardian, should need an assistant. Where is my OUI—wage?"

"I surrender all my rights and powers to you," answered Owen. "I believe—oh, here she is."

Pauline came running from the house and in an instant had Lucille in her arms.

"Want Harry still—and nice?" said Lucille.

"Want the idiotic—and dear? Oh! I'm so glad to see you!"

Owen following, Pauline led the way through the porch to the veranda where she had been ransacked behind an abacus of soft cushions and chocolates when Lucille arrived.

"Disputing as always," said Lucille.

"You Congressman—blatant loot them from a candy date."

They plunged into gossip and sweetmeats. Owen took a seat apart. But presently Pauline called to him: "Will you witness a waiver?"

"With pleasure," said the secretary, stepping quickly to her side. "With the usual out course, that as your guardian, I consider it within my powers."

"This is the best," said Pauline. "Lucille says that Harry won't call for two days. I say he'll be off the phone by 5 o'clock. It's now four. There is a $500 hat at stake. Can I afford that?"

"I will submit to a $500 hat," laughed Owen. "But you are taking a tremendous chance. It strikes me, Miss Marvin."

He had edged close to the box of documents that lay upon the veranda.

MUST CUT DOWN EXPENSE Payroll of Industrial School at St. Anthony is Large. The board of examiners, which has had cause to investigate into the conditions of some of the state institutions, has presented to the effect that the expense of operating the state industrial school at St. Anthony must be reduced and that the expense of operation is entirely unreasonable. The action of the board is said to be unprecedented in the history of the state and the policy adopted will be followed throughout and result in a material reduction in cost of operation. The resolution adopted follows: 'Resolved, that it is the sense of the state board of examiners that the payroll presented by the Idaho Industrial Training School at St. Anthony for the months of January, February and March, totaling $1,955 per month, is excessive and that the same be reduced to the same in the opinion of the board, shows a system too involved and intricate and expensive for the state to bear and the present high rate of taxation, and the state board of education is hereby advised that unless a material reduction is shown in bills hereafter presented from said institution, that said bills will be materially reduced by the said board of examiners. Buick C25 the only car to negotiate the Blue Lakes Grade at this time of the year.

No Car Ever Went Where a Buick Can't

The Buick owners' bonus that mental satisfaction, that peace of mind, of knowing that they are not going to find any roads that will stop them.

It is not one thing about a Buick that makes everyone of those 200,000 Buick users a Buick booster. They know a Buick will take them anywhere and bring them back.

This has always been true of the Buick. A Buick never was a disappointment.

Some automobile manufacturers are continually changing their cars, changing starters, changing ignition, changing gear ratio, trying to rectify their mistakes of the past. We can show you cars less than a year old that are now on the second hand market at less than fifty cents on the dollar.

Just try and buy a second hand Buick. You'll find the man who owns a Buick always gets the idea that his Buick is the best Buick the Buick people ever built.

We can show more old cars with greater mileage behind them that are still pulling the Shoshone Falls grade with their loads than any other two makes put together and you have never heard of a worn out Buick.

We are anxious to give you a demonstration over routes that Really Prove the cars. Will you let us?

PERILS OF PAULINE

Pauline's hand was in his side pocket.

As he spoke he withdrew the hand swiftly with the foot in its clasp.

"The sound of a bell inside the house drew Pauline to her feet.

"I told you so," she declared. "There he is now."

As she rushed through the door, Owen stood laughing with Lucille. His hands were behind his back, and a mischievous smile was in one hand. His contents were poured, silently, quickly, under cover of the laughter, upon the chandeliers in the hall.

"Say hello to Harry," said a voice over the telephone to Pauline.

"Oh, you darling!"

"Why the enthusiasm?"

"I bet Lucille, you'd call up before 5, and you'd."

"We who? Just get Lucille and anybody else you like and come up here. It's lonesome as the grave. The guides are all away and nobody has been in the club shack, as far as I can see, for a year."

"Oh, you want me to come up and see how things are?"

"No, I've got a man—a kind of a man at work. Everything will be clean, safe and clean when you arrive, but Billy Erling's next word to the office, that he couldn't come and I'm all alone—and—well, I'm afraid of the dark."

"Hold the wire," said Pauline.

She ran out on the veranda. "I've won," she cried. "But why, do you dare go with me up to Harry's lodge and shoot at him?"

"She had it all arranged beforehand."

"Miss Lucille," said Owen, laughing.

"You have been a good girl."

"Oh, come on," urged Pauline. "Don't mind him—although—well, he'll take him with us."

"I don't want to go with such a scrupulous better," declared Owen.

"Will you, Lucille?"

"I'll go, if you go. I have been up most of your shooting. I must see that you behave yourself, even if it costs me $500 a minute."

"How can you do that?"

"Yes, you can't do as my new motorcycle, if you don't mind. I want to give it a try. It's Harry's and I'll take the car ready for tomorrow morning."

"You are a dear! Have a cigarette," cried Pauline, presenting the box to him.

His face blanched suddenly, but no member of the girls noticed it. "No, I think not," he said, with quick command.

Pauline offered the empty to Lucille, but she, too, declined.

"Very well," said Pauline. "I'll eat my fill myself."

There was a hungry eagerness in Owen's eyes as he saw her take a piece of candy from the box. But no shadow of distrustfully. But no shadow of distrustfully.

"Nothing at all," answered Owen, as she ate.

"Where is your motorcycle?"

"In the yard."

"Tell me where there is a doctor and I will run there. I will give you a few dollars—well, a few minutes he was walking briskly up the road, down which they had driven a little while before.

There came a low call from the bushes, a call in exact reproduction of that which had announced the presence of Balthazar at the McCallan camp in the Adirondacks two months before.

Owen stopped and looked behind him down the road. He looked ahead, then, quickly, he plunged into the bushes.

Balthazar stood there.

"You have got Savell?"

"Yes, Master?"

"That is the girl? Has he the nerve to do the thing we want done?"

"Well—"

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that if he has his drug he will do anything. If he has not—"

"We can arrange that. You got him out of the door farm without trouble?"

"Without trouble, but not without money, Master."

"What do I care about money? The point is can Savell talk, argue, bluff, fight if need be?"

"If he has the drug, Master. You know yourself."

"My personal habits do not concern you, Balthazar."

"Forgive me, I shall be circumspect, but at this moment he is a young man, Master. Something must be done."

"An hour—only two miles."

"Give him this. I mean give it to him in measure—enough to make him work, but enough to hamper him. This is a serious business, Balthazar."

Owen handed to the spy—a packet of powders.

"I shall have him at your service—completely at your service—within two hours," said Balthazar.

"Within less time if possible. The more the better."

from here, Mr. Marvin. It is useless."

"Harry," said the faint voice of Pauline from the bank. "Harry, where are you? I want water, I want water."

He ran and Relt beside her. He placed a glass to her lips and she drank eagerly.

"I believe I can do it," suddenly cried Raymond Owen.

"What?" demanded Harry, turning.

"I think I know where I can find a doctor."

"Then go," it takes all night to kill you, see him," cried Harry.

Owen opened up the door.

CHAPTER XXXII

Lucille and Harry, kneeling beside the lodge bunk on which Pauline lay, by her side, looked at each other with the fear that comes of helplessness.

"That Harry," cried Lucille, "where is he?"

"She says he is a doctor. I should not like a doctor—think I can't go and look for one—in the car?"

"Dear child, the girls in Haddon village, I bet, they'll tell you to get out of town, to get out of town, to get out of town."

"I'm afraid so," he answered.

sniffing cynically behind his disguise.

Harry stopped middle, but he stood very near as Savell, with quick nervous movements, pretended to examine Pauline.

"Give me water, Harry, give me water!" she pleaded weakly.

Balthazar stood silent at the door.

Harry stepped toward her with the glass in his hand.

"—no water. That is the last thing she would have," said Savell authoritatively. "Please allow me—"

He stepped in front of Harry and examined his teeth. Suddenly—a little too suddenly to the mind of the crime artist—Owen—he sprang to his feet and said:

"Mr. Marvin, it is a case of acute nephritis."

Harry's face paled, but in an instant he commanded himself. "Owen, you'll have to take the motorcycle and run for the village fast as you can go. Get Harry and the car. She must be in New York tomorrow."

"What do you mean, Mr. Marvin?" asked Owen stepping forward.

"Acute nephritis means an operation," replied Harry. "Doesn't he doctor?" he asked of Savell.

"—amalgamate, yes," replied Savell. "But he will not permit of any journey whatsoever. This operation must be performed here—and now."

Harry looked at the man incredulously. "What?" he exclaimed. "My sister to be operated upon here? No! Only the best and greatest physician in the world can operate on her."

"Mr. Marvin, I believe—I am sure you are mistaken," said Owen with a shrug. "I believe, Mr. Marvin, I MUST know more than we do about the girl."

"Harry, I think so too. See how she looks—how she suffers," cried Lucille.

As Harry turned toward Pauline, a razor slipped out of the pocket of the man in the doorway and fell to the ground.

SILAGE FERMENTATION.

(By W. M. Esten and C. J. Mason.)

The following is a digest under this title of Bulletin No. 70, issued by the Storrs Experiment Station of Connecticut. It is, by all odds, the most complete work on the subject of the preservation of silage. Being founded on five years of investigation by eminent scientists, it is a work worthy of inspection, and is authoritative in its conclusions.

The bulletin treats intelligently on the changes which corn undergoes after it has been placed in the silo, and explains the curing process minutely. From this bulletin we learn there are two acids developed during the curing process—the silicic, which are lactic acid and acetic acid. These acids serve not only as a preservative, but also as an aid in digestion, and as a tonic to the animal. The development of these acids is favored by high temperature which is essential to the perfect preservation of the silage.

The authors explain in this bulletin the silo should be properly constructed and of a non-conductive material. Quoting from a part of their bulletin, on page twelve, paragraph three, we have the requirements for the proper curing of silage.

"The necessary factors are, proper temperature, lack of air, symmetry. The development of heat is spontaneous. The lack of air is obtained by close packing and pressure of the silage and proper construction of the silo. The factors are automatic and are produced in perfection in a properly constructed wooden silo. In determining the curing of silage on different temperatures, the authors give data on the benefit derived by the higher temperature in the curing of silage, and conclude with the following recommendations:

1. This experiment explains why silage does not keep as well in cement silos or brick silos. The cement, stone and brick conduct away the heat generated in the silo and the acid fermentation checked, unless the temperature of the silo at silage time is much warmer than normal. Another factor is that cement and brick are porous and allow the silage to get air which causes it to spoil. The appearance of silage is not a complete guide as to its quality. It may appear to keep perfectly at the edge of a cement silo, but the acid and chemical tests are necessary to prove that it is normal silage. The odor of silage is the best test.

2. In testing the silage produced by different kinds of silos they give the following comment, to explain the reasons why wood makes the best material for preserving the silage.

3. "In the first place, wood is a poor conductor of heat. It conserves the warm temperature at the beginning of fermentation so the proper acid is formed, and prevents largely the freezing of silage. Secondly, silage keeps best against wood and nothing is lost around the edges of the silo. Some cement silos quite a loss of silage is experienced at the edges.

4. The testing of conduction by using a silo having a number of different materials in the wall—alternating wood, brick, etc., gave the investigator a good opportunity to note the bacterial changes which take place as enforced by heat or cold, and they conclude their bulletin by the following statement:

"When ensilage comes into contact with the brick and the cement surface of the stone and the brick, the heat generated by fermentation is conducted away so rapidly that the temperature does not rise to the height necessary to prevent the development of the organisms of putrefaction; that is, to prevent rotting; or, averts the temperature does not rise to a height sufficient to cause the best development of the organisms which, by the development of the organisms of putrefaction. The successful preservation of certain organisms which, by the development of their development, retard or prevent growth of organisms which would be detrimental."

Professor Henry, of the Wisconsin experiment station, has also arrived at the same conclusion. In the Broadacre of June 13, 1888, he says: "Probably the most serious disease of corn built in the future, an experience shows that stone wall chills the silage during the curing process, and if it does not seriously injure the portion next to it to a thickness of several inches, it renders it, at least, less palatable than ensilage near the top of the silo. In my own judgment, that the silo has not room enough for the corn to stay in its construction. On our experimental farm at Madison our first silo, built in 1881, was of stone, and our conclusion was that the silage made up of results obtained from this silo; had we put up a wooden structure, I am confident our results would have been worth nearly twice to our people than they have been."

CONCLUSION.

1. The preservation of corn silage is essentially the change of sugar into several acids. The most important change is the conversion of a part of the sugar into lactic acid bacteria into lactic acid. A second change is produced by the action of yeasts on the remaining sugar and is called alcoholic fermentation. The acetic bacteria change the alcohol into acetic acid.

2. The exclusion of air is necessary for the preservation and preservation of silage.
3. The walls of a silo should be non-conductors of heat, cold and moisture.

4. Mature corn makes silage of better quality with less waste.
5. Silage undergoes a ripening, somewhat similar to the ripening of cheese, which softens the fiber, makes more digestible the proteins and adds to the palatability of the silage. This ripening occurs from three to four weeks.

6. A silo is the cheapest form of silage.
7. Any farm product can be silaged, providing there is sufficient sugar in the mixture to be fermented into acetic acid.

8. The following mixtures will successfully and make a very desirable and nearly balanced ration. Alfalfa, clover, and timothy or wheat or oats, peas and beans, and corn and cow peas, or soy beans.

9. The following mixtures will, taking all things into consideration, has proven most satisfactory.
10. Nothing excels the feeding of silage, especially during the dry summer months, for keeping up the milk flow to its highest point.

FARM HAND'S NARROW ESCAPE

Heid Under Water by Weight of His Plow.

A young man by the name of Garner, a farm hand employed by E. W. Wardell on what was formerly known as the Leonard ranch four miles north of town, had a narrow escape from death in a runaway accident which occurred yesterday evening.

It seems that he was driving along the road with a nice plow when his team took fright at something and made a dash down the road. When the plow was in a narrow escape from the ditch, the plow was thrown into the ditch and the driver pinned underneath it.

The accident was witnessed by Fred Marvaneau, who rushed to the scene and after heroic efforts managed to get the man out of the ditch sufficiently to release Garner. The latter was badly bruised and it was at first thought that his chest was crushed.

English Women of High Rank Doing Her Part in Ministering to the Wounded.

A tall, slim woman with girlish face and figure was moving about the hospital—among wounded men and fever patients. She is a correspondent in northern France. A French soldier, encouraged, perhaps, by her face and kindly eyes, scrambled to his feet from behind the straw and walked to her holding out his battered arm.

"Oh, my dear girl, my dear girl," he said. "I have been in a French soldier's hands for days unattended, un-bathed. He could hardly stand up. She took his arm—his undamaged arm—and led him to the surgeon. Through his black and white cap he saw it was Millicent's. She had been there when she was down at the clearing house collecting patients for her hospital at Malces-Baine, away on the coast. Her motor-ambulance and her stretcher parties were outside staking their claim with wounded men.

"Do have a look at it for him, will you?" she said. "The surgeon's scissors were soon through the rough bandaging of the wound and it lay exposed, swollen and puffed, with a fragment of shrapnel buried deep in the angry flesh.

A French officer was in the hospital detaching the cases to the various hospitals in the vicinity. French ambulances were carrying off men after man to their ambulances. Other men could not work too fast. Another trainload of wounded from the front was waiting outside—waiting for the straw and room of these maimed human beings in the warehouse. They had been waiting in the line, too, and other trains were not far behind.

SMALL FAMILIES THE RULE

Birth Rate Unnaturally Low Among American Men of Science, Is Assertion Made.

Prof. J. McKee Cattell of Columbia university has been engaged for several years on a study of the families of 4,000 American men of science. He has found that the birth rate is not yet complete. Professor Cattell has proved that the birth rate is decidedly low among this part of the population. The Journal of Heredity publishes the following synopsis of his conclusions:

"The completed family of contemporary scientific men is about 1.5, and the number of surviving children from each scientific man about 1.2. Twenty-two per cent of the families are childless; only one family in seventy-five is larger than six. The same conditions obtain for other college graduates. Answers have been received from 467 leading scientists mentioning the cause of their small families in the size of their families. One hundred and seventy-six were not voluntarily limited, while 285 were so limited. The cause of the voluntary limitation being health, in 133 cases; in 93 cases health and various other reasons in 41 cases. Childlessness was involuntary in two-thirds of the cases. In the standardized family of two the condition is desired in six cases out of every seven. In one-third of the families the limitation was involuntary, due to pathological causes, but if these had not obtained, voluntary limitation would have occurred in nearly all, or, perhaps, in all of the cases."

I wish to thank the managers of the Twin Falls County Mutual Fire Insurance Company for prompt and satisfactory settlement in full for loss of residence by fire.

Service a Requisite of Any Meal

Fresh viands and daintily prepared dishes to be appreciated must have careful serving in order that the diner be satisfied. Sloppy service often spoils the best cooked dishes to the taste of the patron, because of the idea of uncleanly methods gained.

The cafe or restaurant that can combine service with delightfully cooked foods appeals to the people of today. We believe that in the Rogerson Cafe that we have just the combination to please—and hold our customers.

Clean and neat service coupled with the best culinary methods known, are what we are striving to give you at prices no higher than you will pay for poorly cooked meals. Your patronage will be appreciated.

ADVERTISING ON CASH BASIS

Short Line to Discontinue Advertising Missage.

On and after July 1, 1915, the Oregon Short Line will discontinue the practice of exchanging advertising allowances for use in this state in payment for advertising. This means that newspapermen will not be able to ride on advertising allowances. They will be required to pay cash fares to the Oregon Short Line. Notices to that effect have been disseminated by E. C. Murray, general passenger agent of the road, to the publishers of newspapers in Idaho. The communication says in part:

"Effective July 1, 1915, the Oregon Short Line Railroad company will discontinue the practice of exchanging advertising allowances for advertising trip tickets in payment for advertising. Thereafter, any advertising authorized or contracted for by the company will be in cash basis and credit given for any unused mileage returned promptly at the end of the year. Any advertising mileage or trip tickets issued subsequent to March 22, 1915, will be limited to the end of the present fiscal year, June 30, 1915."—Opinion News.

Certainly not as distinguished as distinctive was a certain guest which Glenn Ferry, in his midst on that Sunday. The person to whom we refer was a feminine hobo, a genuine blowed-in-the-gold article, and just as much so as any man could be. When first seen, trudging down Idaho avenue, she at once reminded on that she might be a lady Rip Van Winkle. She wore clothes of the ragged kind and heavy shoes twice too big. The "clatter-bang" sound of the brogans as she moved along the cement sidewalk was about her apparent. Laid-off worry standard of life. In the afternoon she was noticed by different persons sitting with a gang of men around a "bo-campfire" down below the blockyards. She smoked a cob pipe and from all appearances was as much on the high as anybody.—Glenn Ferry Gazette.
