

POST WAR EDUCATION PROBLEMS SHOWN IN TWIN FALLS COUNTY

Needs of Local School System Set Forth in Report to Directors of Independent School District Number 1...Necessity of expansion is Apparent if Rising Generation is to Have the Benefit of Modern Educational Work.

One of the most comprehensive and thorough-going analyses of the educational needs of a community yet worked out is contained in the report by Hal G. Bliss, head of Independent School District Number 1, and submitted to the school board of directors at its recent meeting of last body.

Concrete plays a big part in the constructive work on a farm. We offer no course to enable boys to meet this type of situation. Many farms are equipped with tools for simple blacksmithing. Our boys receive no training that will enable them to sharpen their joints, work chisels, etc. Farm boys should know when they have finished the work of this department how to build the ordinary structures found on a farm, such as chicken houses, pig pens, gates, hay racks, etc. The limited work we offer does not so equip them. Electricity plays a big part in the work affairs of our community. We make no effort to train boys to meet situations involved in the use of electrical appliances. The tractor is now coming into its own in the work of the farm. A course in gas engines and automobile repairing would definitely prepare our boys to meet the situation involved in owning a tractor. The biggest industry in this community is that involved on the farms. Yet our high school does absolutely nothing to prepare our rural boys to meet situations arising in their actual work environments. I cannot see how this matter can longer be ignored.

exist if we are going to take our place in the great forward movement now getting under way.

Agriculture

In a program of broadening the vocational departments of our high school, it is well to include the department of agriculture. This department has heretofore achieved a reasonable measure of success. Due to conditions arising out of the great war, the department was forced to close at the beginning of the present year. The board should appoint a well trained and competent director to take up the work at the opening of the second semester. This director should be employed on a yearly basis to twelve calendar months in order that he may give attention to the vocational activities of the boys and girls during the summer months. The reorganization of this department should involve a definite policy of correlation and conference with the department of manual training. The problems of the one department are closely akin to those of the other. The needs of the boys and the two departments are largely identical.

Commerce

The commercial department must not be neglected in this program of expansion. The work in this department is well organized. However, it is in need of helpful differentiation. Courses should be offered in office practice, salesmanship, business organization, etc. The courses in commercial geography and industrial history are especially significant now and the organization and teaching of them should bring proper emphasis to the side of economics. These supplemental courses, including business English, should be definitely organized within the department so that no possible conflict of ideals and aims will be apparent.

The Upper Grammar Grades

In discussing the matter of reorganizing and differentiating the vocational courses in the high school, the premise was made that such reorganization must necessarily be predicated on the introduction of vocational work in the upper grammar grades. This premise leads directly and logically to the consideration of what to my mind is the most pressing educational problem confronting the board of education. This problem is involved in the disposition now made of the 375 boys and girls enrolled in the seventh and eighth grades. We shall now throw some light on this particular problem.

As you probably know, our seventh and eighth grade pupils are distributed throughout the system as follows: Forty-five in the seventh grade at the Washington school, 125 in the seventh and eighth grades at the Lincoln school, 125 in the seventh and eighth grades at the Bickel school, and 70 in the last half of the eighth grade at the high school. The high school is used as the housing place for the 8A pupils because there is no place for them in the elementary building. In the Lincoln school, four school rooms of normal size and one small office room are used for these pupils. The pupils sit permanently in these rooms and in order to carry out the departmental scheme for organizing these pupils, the seventh and eighth grade teachers move from room to room to meet their classes. The only place in this school for group or assembly meetings for the pupils is the corridor on the upper floor. When assembly exercises are held, many of the pupils must sit on the floor. The seventh and eighth grade pupils in the Bickel school are more fortunate. Their assembly room, used effectively as a study hall, is the room formerly used by the high school when it was housed in the Bickel building. The assembly room stage serves as a classroom and three additional classrooms are used on the floor below. In the Washington school, the seventh grade pupils have the use of the building assembly hall as a classroom and also as a very desirable place for upper grammar grade exercises for the largest number of pupils in the high school building have been moved into the regular high school organization and they are thus given many distinct advantages.

The work in these upper grammar grades is organized on a departmental basis. This means that the teachers are employed with particular reference to their ability as to experience to teach particular subjects. For example, a teacher is employed particularly to teach arithmetic, another particularly to teach grammar, etc. Please do not mistake this plan for a departmentalizing these grades carried with it distinctly new and modern types of curriculum organization. The fact of the matter is that the program of studies is narrowly traditional and limiting. It is the type of program one could have found in modern school systems of two or three decades ago. There is not a single factor in the organization or in the program of work offered that would lead one to believe that the matter of adolescence was ever given even the slightest consideration in disposing of these boys and girls. We are forced to ask by what right or authority have we ignored the guiding hand of adolescence in planning a program of educational endeavor for upper grammar grade children. The seventh grade marks in a fairly definite way the point of emergence into the adolescent period with its new impulses, its new interests, its awakening purposes, and its broadening horizons. We cling to a traditional program of work and the fine tolling influences of adolescent years find riotous expression finally to lose themselves, for the most part, in the dull formality of a rigid organization.

New Type of School

The organization of the seventh and eighth grades of a junior high school or intermediate school basis would provide the type of machinery necessary to meet in better fashion the individual and group needs of our adolescent boys and girls. Greater flexibility would be offered not only in the shaping up of a program of study for any child but in the matter of graduation and promotion as well. Failure in study would not then mean that the pupil must remain in the same grade and again pursue subjects which he successfully passed. Promotion would be by subject rather than by grade. This single point reflects in a clear way the important matter of time economy relative to the school life of the pupil. It lies at the heart of the task of warding off the discouragement and prolonging the school life of the pupil. Such organization would admit of the introduction of vocational work and thus give vocational minded pupils the opportunity to lead out in the direction prompted by their individual needs and abilities. Wholesome socialization could be given to the group organization and to the program of work under the new plan. Encouragement would be given to intelligent self-direction through student activities and definite preparation made for the responsibility of individual initiative and action so necessary in the work of the senior high school. Variety and richness of curriculum content would seek to understand and to satisfy the broadening interests and larger life of our adolescent students. Through the medium of this single problem, we have the opportunity of making a lasting contribution to the life of this community. This contribution would ultimately reach out and leave its enduring touch upon the great and fundamental interests of the nation. The way is open. It is as clear as day. Let us go forth and make possible the crowning event in the work of constructing a system of public education for this community.

The Matter of Building

Elsewhere in this paper, the discussion of school capacity and school enrollment closed with the statement that the first step in a plan to meet the needs and demands of the near future would be that of providing greater housing space. I have tried clearly to show that the matter of enlarging our school capacity lies at the heart of such of two problems that have come to points of issue, namely: (a) that of providing room for enrollment increases which the near future will bring, and (b) that of making possible the reorganization and broadening of the work of the upper grammar grades and of the vocational departments in the high school. Either problem must be predicated on the issue of school house construction. Now let us see just what type of construction will adequately open the way for the solution of both problems. I shall have to the matter of "both problems" because we cannot afford to take a half-measure stand on issues so far-reaching and vital. The call of the hour does not involve giving attention to one and ignoring the other. The two problems are so interdependent and interrelated that differentiation for the purpose of giving attention to one only is out of the question.

Temporary One-Room Buildings

We might endeavor to meet this issue by the construction of temporary frame one-room buildings such as were built to care for congestion appearing during the present school year. This type of construction simply provides for the relief of crowded quarters. It offers no helpful solution of the vital and fundamental problems hanging over for consideration. Not going further than to eliminate congestion it would not touch the matter of using basements for all-day school rooms for elementary pupils. It would leave the seventh and eighth grade organization as it is. It would contribute nothing to the plan of broadening and expanding the vocational courses of the high school. It is the type of construction that does not reflect in any way the splendid spirit of progress and growth that has always motivated the people of this community. It involves a policy somewhat dangerous in that it tends to fix the habit of simply providing any kind of quarters for our boys and girls and sight is soon lost of large educational issues the solution of which is possible only through a wise building policy. So, the conclusion is that this type of building meets our present problem in a very unsatisfactory manner and leaves our second problem untouched.

Elementary Grade Building

We might also endeavor to meet the issue by the construction of an elementary grade building. Such a building could be erected within the city limits on the south side of Rock Creek. This building would care for city children living in that section and for the rural children living in the southwest quarter of the district. A building of six rooms would be large enough to house the children living in these sections. Such a building would make little headway in the problem of eliminating basement rooms. I would also leave our vital and pressing problem—proper opportunities for our seventh and eighth grade children—untouched. As far as our fundamental educational issues are concerned we could not take a single step forward. The conclusion is that this type of construction would meet our first problem in a very satisfactory and effective way but contribute nothing to the solution of the second.

including water and an electrically operated pumping plant on every 80 acres.

Electricity for light and power on every farm.

Splendid markets on all sides. Good roads.

Convenient to normal, high and grammar schools.

Splendid class of neighbors.

Every farmer who knows of the marvelous fertility and rare desirability of Capay Rancho lands will welcome this announcement as a real opportunity. The three subdivisions in this famous Capay grant, all of them much larger than this one, were bought up in record time by prominent, successful farmers from almost every state on the Pacific slope. This subdivision offers advantages over those previously offered in that this entire countryside has now been built up into a thriving community. Crop records and tests have been made and precedents established. The pioneering has been done. Definite land values have been established here by actual proven production. It is most remarkable that land of this character in the very midst of the most marvelous farming country in all California, surrounded on all sides by thriving, fully developed farms, should be available today as practically virgin land, and at original subdivision prices. The land is very level and lies as pretty as any farming country you ever saw. The soil is a rich, black loam, absolutely free from alkali, with no hardpan and no gumbo—a splendid soil to work, and wonderful for crop production. There is only enough of this land for a comparatively few buyers. Those who act first will be the ones to profit by the opportunity. It should be very easy to pay for the land complete out of the crops of the first few years. If you are interested in such a proposition, we suggest that you get in touch with us at once so that there will be no danger of our having to disappoint you.

THE YEAR AHEAD

Nineteen hundred nineteen will be a good year for those who have the proper combination of nerve and ability to take advantage of its opportunities.

Whether or not, when the end of the year rolls around, the general verdict will be favorable or otherwise, is largely a psychological proposition.

Over the country there is a note of unrest perhaps never before paralleled in the history of America.

The eyes of America must be kept focused on the larger aspect of the situation, then, with proper management in a national sense.
