WASHINGTON, May 23.—Go to work or fight! That is the dictum of the government today by Provost Marshal General Crowder in an amendment to the selective service regulations dealing with the question of compelling registered men not engaged in a useful occupation to apply themselves to some form of labor contributing to the general good. The rich, poor or free, will find himself confronted with the alternative of finding suitable employment or entering the army.

SEATTLE, Wash., May 23.—Typhus is raging in Petrograd and thousands of the lower classes of Russians are starving, according to G. W. Willis, an American business man who is here today having just returned from the Russian capital where he spent five years. He said the situation in Petrograd is such that the Germans would gain nothing by entering the city and probably do not want to take over the task of restoring order.

THE DAILY TWIN FALLS TIMES

Published Every Day Except Sunday by the TIMES PRINTING & PUBLISHING COMPANY Twin Falls, Idaho News of the World to the Hour C. L. Langley, General Manager J. H. Wheeler, Associate Editor

(Entered at the Twin Falls postoffice as second class matter as a daily publication, April 11, 1918).

The TIMES is an independent Democratic newspaper, but it knows no politics as opposed to the most unbridled and ignorant prosecution of the war that is possible. Therefore, it is AIN any man, Democrat or Republican, caught throwing hardware into the machinery—either with his hands or with his mouth. If it is "partisan," make the best of it!

BRING ROUND THE HOBY WITH SENATE COMMITTEE

The senate committee on military affairs finds itself just where it was all the time since the passage of the resolution last year giving it power to spend money to investigate war matters. It needed no special authority to do that more than what it already had. This was conclusively shown in a discussion of the question on the floor of the senate, after the filing of the majority and minority aircraft reports. The really significant thing is that it is not now, even by inference, clothed with the power to constitute itself into an entirely separate thing—a committee—on the conduct of the war.

Last year this committee was empowered to investigate and in the middle of December suddenly awoke, "smarting," the press report said, and with beating of tom-toms and waving of telems began calling attention before hand to the things that were about to be found.

Reports of shortcoming, real enough in some instances, instead of being reported to the proper authorities for prompt correction, were carefully husbanded and cherished in order to make a "good" case. We remember one time listening to an expert on sugar mill machinery describe the starting of a new factory. He said that after every expert had put his best efforts forth to get every cog in the exact spot where it should secure the greatest efficient efficiency it was always the case that the machinery would not work well at first, and the first year's production would not be up to standard. A lot of cogs in the vast, newly erected war machinery were not doing 100 per cent work and there was a slowing up in consequence. There were cogs with hidden flaws that looked all right until pressure was brought to bear when they gave way. There were pieces of machinery that were superfluous, using up part of the power. The wheels were clogged by rubbish in the shape of unneeded supplies, some of them a century old. Hence, there was room for improvement. Helpful suggestion, much of it radical, should have been and would have been welcome. But the senate committee had particular stress on exploiting its ability to discover rather than on its qualifications to invent, so the country was misled and started and worried by tales told in all the variety and dramatic power that characterized the romances of Dr. F. A. Cook regarding his polar explorations.

Finally, after wandering over a vast extent of territory, the committee concentrated on aircraft, where things had not worked out as well as promised and hoped. After a long time spent in an investigation of this particular branch of the war service two reports, majority and minority, were filed. The story of what was done and happened as told by senators on the floor makes interesting reading. Ninety members, constituting the majority, on reading certain charges made against two or three members of the committee, determined to bring in the statement which constituted the majority report. Six members vigorously protested against this on the ground that before any final meeting should be made the testimony collected should be laid before President Wilson and a consultation held with him relative to the best means of handling the situation. These urged that the president might throw some light on conditions, and that it would be unwise bring in any report until all available information bearing on the subject had been secured. An explanation of the attitude of the majority of the committee Senator Hitchcock says that they rejected the advice of the sixty members constituting the minority, as they felt it beneath the dignity of a senate committee to lay a report before the executive before presenting it. Senator Hitchcock admitted that a senate investigation might interfere with an investigation by the attorney general if such were contemplated by the executive, but thought that the committee was right in standing on its rights and dignity. On a phase of the matter seems to have escaped the senator, and that is that if they had gone frankly to the president and talked it over with him, they could have found out all about the Bergian rumpus without reiving on hearsay later on.

Determined to report, the majority presented its statement of the case. The minority differed equally. Threatened by Senator Beckham of Kentucky, returned to the position that they had not exhausted all means of securing information and that no report of any kind should be filed. Three members signed a minority report in which, while admitting most of the specific statements made by the majority, so far as they went, declared that they were partial and omitted many things which when fully stated showed the situation up in a different and much better light.

Chairman Chamberlain and Vice Chairman Hitchcock claimed that the future of the committee were finished with that they should not go ahead without further instructions. That they could proceed to investigate under the resolution under which they had previously acted, was undoubted. Several committee members insisted that that should be done. This was especially the position of the three members who, when the committee refused to sign the report because all available sources of information had not been exhausted.

After following the lead of the chairman and vice chairman until it was reported that the attorney general would investigate and that the house would look into the aircraft situation, the senate majority made another theatrical entrance, this time in the role of a committee on the conduct of the war. It was against this last assumption that President Wilson protested.

This committee failed to get reported into something else and now drops back to where it was before and can go ahead, just as it could have done without further authority. The ingenueness of the investigation by the majority can be judged from their past history. But after all, when its limitations are kept in mind perhaps it can do some good. The knowledge that the slightest flaw will be magnified into a labyrinth, which some honest folk will mistake for a very remarkable thing is happening in America. Liberals and radicals of all shades and degrees of opinion are finding a common ground, and need before them a common road leading to that new social order of which we have striven so long without hope of arriving at our destination in this generation of the next. That common ground is the program of the British Labor Party. Haven't we noticed it? Have we not pointed it out? Have we not said that it was intensely correct? And have we not pointed out, again and again, upon whom all of these "liberals and radicals of all shades and degrees of opinion" are focusing their attention and regarding whom they are expressing their most ardent commendation?

"These liberal forces are immensely strong," our "Journal of Democracy" informs us. At any rate they think they are. "They already are more united than at any time in the past generation, and by the leadership of President Wilson."

So, President Wilson, if this be true, leads "liberals and radicals of all shades and degrees of opinion!" We have long thought so. As a weather-borne blight from point to point, it indicates which way the wind blows. Stability, however, never was synonymous with weather-steadiness, but, given that, it represents "all shades and degrees" of breezes.

"The man who was re-elected" because he kept out of war and who again expects either himself to be re-elected, or to have his party continue in control of the government because he keeps us in war, is a man to be reckoned with. In a political sense, does any one suppose Mr. Wilson cares who or what he is alleged to "represent?" If he can retain the political power he now enjoys—American Economy.

The above incoherent yowl from the leading organ of the privileged indicates the animus that prompts it and prompts a large number of critics of the chief executive of this nation at the present time.

The philosophy of the criticism seems to be that President Wilson, having used every diplomatic means in his power, compatible with national honor to avoid war, is responsible that, now that we are in, we shall remain in the contest until the fight for democracy has been won. For a statesman who has a little common sense and will not swallow such fish stories, and who wants to stand up for the great masses of the people it has nothing but contempt.

It has some followers in the senate in both parties, but they are too smooth to openly avow the cause of their fights on the administration.

not so much for himself as for the whole French nation, which in a measure he represents in America—a man inspired with a patriotism and with a devotion to high ideals which finds expression not only in words but in deeds of self-sacrifice that have something in them akin to the divine—such a man viewed the Irish question somewhat in this light:

"It is not time," he said in substance, "to sit in council settling domestic disputes when the house is burning over our heads and the Irish should remember that. The house of civilization is burning."

His intimation was that the Irish question, if not he could wait, and he spoke as a lover of freedom, and exhorting action in the cause of world freedom. He spoke also as a Celt—a Gael to a Gael—and as a Frenchman, native of the country which was long a hereditary foe to the Anglo-Saxon race both on the old hemisphere and on the new—a country whose interests, territorial, commercial and even religious, clashed with those of the English for almost a thousand years.

France in the past has shared nothing in the Briton's boast of Crecy or Trafalgar, Corunna, Abraham Heights, Plaisy, Waterloo and a hundred other battlefields that have been names to conjure with in England. But France is now fighting side by side with the British empire in a common struggle in the cause of freedom and democracy.

France has ever been the friend of Ireland and the Irish race as distinct from the landlords representing a foreign strain and a foreign religion. When the Irish were ready in the past, France has lent the aid both of her finances and her blood. The Irish, therefore, may well pause to consider the viewpoint of the French people in the present emergency.

The house of civilization is burning. First mark the contradiction that is extinguished. It is not what matter the other's name? Is Belgium's present condition happier than Ireland's? Yet the fate of Belgium is as nothing compared with that conquering Hun would work on Great Britain, France, Italy and the United States, should vic-

McAdoo and Kitchen Visit the President Washington, May 23—Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo has sought the support of President Wilson in his fight to secure new revenue at this session of congress. It was learned today. The secretary conferred with the president at the White House late yesterday and it was admitted the executive is inclined to agree with the treasury head that new legislation is needed. Meanwhile Representative Claude Kitchen, chairman of the house ways and means committee, sought an appointment with President Wilson today to lay before him the arguments of members of both houses against a new revenue bill at this session. It was emphasized that the declaration the executive is inclined to agree with the treasury head that new legislation is needed. Some of the big scenes in "Dino Jones" occur in an old-fashioned wagon mill. These scenes were taken at Roslyn, Long Island. This mill, built in 1850, is still in use by the original owners. NEW YORK, May 23.—Eddie Cicotte is pinching under the shadow of a "fix."

The little shino ball wizard, star of the "fix" campaign of "the war," was the champion White Sox, is still in search of his first, 1918 victory today, and this season is more than five weeks old.

The Yankees beat Cicotte in four-inning Wednesday. He pitched superb ball for Chicago.

He was in it, for the Sox failed to make a run behind him. Coming on top of a 1 to 0 lead in Washington on Friday, it was a hard job. Cicotte has now lost six straight games, but he has not been pitching around for any length of time. He is in the fall of the Chicago club to make runs behind him, and unless the "run strike" of the Sox ends soon he will find himself deep in the hole.

Large Woodmen Meet In Session Here

Many Candidates For All Parts of Northern Idaho—Patriotic Meeting After Initiation Tonight

A large number of candidates for membership in the Modern Woodmen lodge arrived today from all parts of Idaho. State Lecturer Titus of Rupert and State Deputy Head Constal Tyler, of Boise, will be present and address the order.

During the next meeting of the Woodmen the Royal Neighbors will entertain the outsiders at the Moose hall. At the close of this meeting and entertainment all will go to the Masonic hall where a rousing patriotic meeting will be held and later arrangements made for a grand benefit banquet in the Herriott building, to which all are invited.

It is hoped that some of the men abroad should go through the channels of their local chapter. Classes in first aid are wanted to be started for men. Classes in home care of the sick and dietetics are of the greatest importance, as there will soon be a dearth of qualified nurses all over the country. Idaho leaving school should consider seriously the necessity of entering a hospital for training, to meet the emergency.

Copper Prices Remain Steady Three Months

War Industries Board Refuses Rate for Present in Spite of Pressure Brought to Bear

WASHINGTON, May 23.—There will be no increase in the price of copper for three months beginning June 1, the war industries board announced today following the conference of leading men of the copper industry with members of the War Industries Board.

The copper men brought strong pressure to bear in an effort to have the price raised. They contended that increased costs of labor and long time contracts had resulted in conditions making it imperative that they receive more than the present figure.
