Our Pilgrim fathers crossed the rough waves of the Atlantic and braved the dangers incident to the early settlers of America in order that they might get away from a country where church and state were bled together and where tyranny in religious affairs was the rule rather than the exception.

Party politics have no place in this campaign. Parties are necessary to give expression to voters in their organized capacity, but national issues are not involved in a city campaign.

Regardless of who is elected mayor of the city of Twin Falls at the coming city election we feel sure that the ordinances and laws of the state of Idaho will be enforced to the letter.

But such a thing is virtuous and no one with sane judgment would try to convince others that such would be the case. We know the majority of the candidates who are running for office in the coming election and we feel sure that whichever side wins we will get a set of officials who will direct the future of our city to the best of their ability.

INTOLERANCE AND BLUE LAWS

Want of toleration of the opinions and practices of others is a serious handicap. Yet there are few legislators, reformers or zealous moralists who admit he or she is intolerant.

An earnest group in Massachusetts is trying to pass a law making any Sunday a public holiday, whether it be broad selling or checker playing. Kansas has long had an anti-cigarette selling law, and now is discussing whether it isn't a crime even to own a cigarette.

Without all this is harmless enough; the "blue law" makes little headway against the hard common sense of the United States as a whole. Yet the same spirit of intolerance which declares, because one man finds rolling ivory balls over a green cloth a crime, therefore other men should be made to hold the same views, could easily consider that striking a white ball over a hot is a crime, or batting a baseball over a grass lot is a crime.

It may be wise to remember that this country was founded because the inhabitants could not stand intolerance of those who, abroad, legislated for the colonies; that certain Pilgrims crossed New England from the wilderness because they could not stand the intolerance of religious prosecution—Capital News.

One of the best of the "blue laws" is the one which prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday. It is a law which has stood the test of time and has been the basis of the temperance movement.

Power of Vision of Some of the Smallest of Nature's Creatures Far Above Mankind's.

Have, hummingbirds, and other honey suckers, delicate, pink, deposits but of a size of a dust speck, but with a marvellously perfected sense of sight, which enables them to discriminate between color variations.

In order to minimize the possibility of hybrid plant development through cross-pollination of two unrelated plants, nature has provided in the gradations of color imperceptible to the human eye, but readily discernible to other insects.

Occasionally after a family row, or an annual election, an irresponsible neighbor comes in with a new color of paint, thereby playing hell with the old color.

However, such things rarely happen here, because of the high moral and ethical and reliable individuals. But there isn't anything to be done about it, anyway.

Result to Injury. The 5-12, acting in accordance with its usual benevolent nature, has inexplicably stopped all late commutator's trains, stopped that outside the terminal, and several hundred-regularly keep their eyes and thoughts from where they hang.

Time passed and the 5-12 had no more. The signs of hunger increased. Then, as though the malcontent-railroad men had planned it, along came an omnibus, with a red and white top.

In the fourth coach matters were even worse. The omnibus had pulled up. A miserable crowd of four or five men, with their hats on, were already laid out for the omnibus.

King Tut-ankh-Amen's Middle Name Was Copper, or "the Enduring Life"

Through 6,000 years the two have been associated in minds of men.

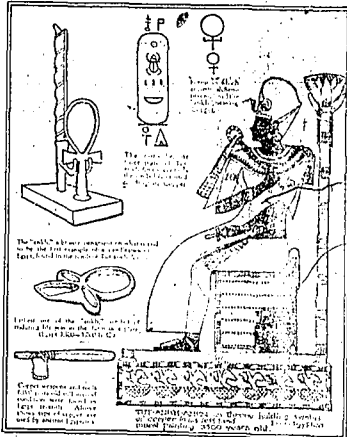

WHEN the two illustrious of Tut-ankh-Amen, the boy pharaoh of the 18th Egyptian Dynasty, were found recently by the archeologists under the leadership of the Earl of Carnarvon, the picture which they present eyes the connection, 6,000 years old, between the ever elusive middle of the enduring life and the earliest metal widely used by mankind.

The Egyptian mind, as indicated the human mind throughout the long history of man, was always necessarily reaching for ways of prolonging life. Copper, which possessed the quality of enduring life, had been used in the valley of the Nile since before the Dynastic days, or 6,000 years before the birth of Christ.

Copper made a strong appeal to the imagination of the people, both because of its usefulness and its endurance, and because in early days it was connected in thought with the "ankh" which was the symbol of the enduring life, throughout the thousands of years from the time of the pharaohs to the present day.

The "ankh" symbolized the Pharaoh's hope of a second existence for which, as seen from the equipment of their tombs, he made ample provision looking toward the time, 3,000 years after his death, when he believed he would take up a new life and have need for comforts and ornaments of all kinds.

Much of the copper used in Egypt came from the island of Cyprus, from which it received its name. It is significant that the "ankh," still denoting enduring life, was found on the person of the golden Venus, who was said to have sprung from the foam of the sea and to have been washed on the shores of the island of Cyprus. Her symbol, the "ankh," the same symbol that was used centuries later by the barytes of forbidden hermetic arts to represent copper.

Venus was an outgrowth of the same idea that found expression and dedication in the Egyptian golden statue. So there is an unbroken line, though the "ankh" of the enduring life in the earliest Egyptian days, the "ankh" used in Tut-ankh-Amen's name, the "ankh" as symbol of Venus or Aphrodite, to the "ankh" which was the secret symbol of the alchemists, made

SERVICE WITH FIGHTING MEN'S Article Ten

WHATEVER one's sentiments as to the part America should take officially in international affairs, it is evident that various agencies and processes of good will which her people have set up are at work throughout the world. Because these things have been fostered for many years, America, Dr. John R. Mott points out, has been in position to give and to expand her services of practical friendship, as related not only to the emergency needs of wars and their resulting conditions, but to the development of those qualities in mankind essential to brotherhood between individuals and nations.

Both by invitation and voluntary extension, these services, expressed in practical form, are spreading the gospel of social responsibility. Such services work quietly, almost unperceived, because they are not political; but they touch millions of human lives, especially the younger generation who are to produce the future leaders, and awaken their innate idealism into boldness and action.

There are now in Europe, instilling into the new nations the best that America has to give, agencies unnumbered and almost unperceived. When the Council of Venetia recognized Lithuania, Latvia, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia as de facto governments there were in each of those countries active American agencies, there because of war conditions, which were planting the seed of future co-operation and stability.

Hither's Polish legation and the Czechoslovak troops in France both came to know and trust their "American Uncles" as they called the Y. M. C. A. men. When the so-called "buffer states" were set up between Eastern Europe and unknown Bolshevik Russia, American secretaries were immediately assigned to both the Polish and Czechoslovak armies. From that service, in many ways more inspiring and difficult than in the war zone in France, there has been planted in each of the "buffer states" the beginnings of local organizations unnumbered and to a considerable degree unperceived. They are the product of the friendship of the trained Americans.

The Republic of Czechoslovakia was non-existent prior to 1920. Its social consciousness represents more than 1,000 years of racial, religious and historical animosities. Late in 1922 the Czechoslovak Y. M. C. A. held its record national convention. During the first two days no foreigner took part, and only on the third day was any foreigner invited to speak. What followed is significant, because observers have since reported that the "unity and fairness" which included Germans and Czechs' shared the Magyar's death with subjects involving differences of opinion would have been settled to a session of the League of Nations. In religious fields they found the solvent for long-simmering divisions.

This Czechoslovak convention is believed to have been the first national meeting ever held in that country of the chief opposing racial elements. The long and periodical divisions among them is scarcely understandable by an American yet it has been the rule in parts of Europe for centuries. The drawing of new boundary lines after the war seemed only to intensify the division. Any evidence of a movement out of such a condition toward friendship and unity is cause for remark. It is of peculiar interest to Americans therefore, that out of their own contributions of ideals and programs has come inspiration, not only in Czechoslovakia but elsewhere, for a new co-operation among groups and races. It is in no such service and results that the welfare work of the American people during the war has led. It is the work for fighting men disclosed a whole new range of international service. It became, as it were, a sort of social idealism from one nation to another.

There is a higher motive, it is clear, for international service than that of selfish advantage. But to many countries this fact has come as a startling revelation. As regards America, her welfare service has shown that what her nations call our "nation for unity" does not mean patronage or condescension. It has exhibited some of the best social forces in American life. The American Y. M. C. A. has exhibited some of the best social forces in American life. The American Y. M. C. A. has exhibited some of the best social forces in American life. The American Y. M. C. A. has exhibited some of the best social forces in American life.

So it is that this welfare work has opened up new channels, through which the good will of the American people can flow to other nations. There is nothing that holds more promise for the future than the fact that there exists throughout the world today activities of a humanitarian character inspired and guided by American agencies.

The future of the new-born nations, or of the older ones for that matter, is not primarily a question of statesmen, of diplomats, and of ideal boundaries; it is a question of human and woman who are the heart and whose hearts are set on the path toward a new world. They are not by law, or by force, or by the sword, or by the power of the strong, but by the power of the good will of the American people, who are the heart and whose hearts are set on the path toward a new world.
