CHAPTER XXV

"You really must do something for this fellow, Phillip," Mrs. Cavendish spoke with decision. The newspaper which she was reading was fairly well worn, and she had looked up at him what astoundedly. "Yes, yes. Of course, my dear," he murmured. "What does he want now?" "Why, he wants his liberty! He wants this absurd charge against him dismissed! It's a shame to hold a boy of his character in this way, on the mere word of a man like Count Courteau."

Colonel Cavendish smiled quizzically. "You, too, eh?" said he. "What do you mean by that?" "Why, you're the fourth woman who has appealed to me since his arrest. I dare say I'll hear from you, too. I never saw a fellow who had the female vote so solidly behind him. I'm beginning to regard him as a sort of domestic menace." "You surely don't believe him guilty?" "When her husband refused to commit himself, Mrs. Cavendish exclaimed, "Bah! Bah!" "First Josephine came to me," the colonel observed. "She was deeply indignant and considerably disappointed in me as a man and a father when I refused to commit myself to proceedings and apologize on behalf of the Dominion Government, for the injury to the lady's feelings. She was actually nervous. What else her I don't know. Then the Countess Courteau dropped in and she said 'I'd like to see you, my dear, but you can't do anything for me. You're a dealer in the Klazo. Now take up his case, and I'll be your breaker passed thoughtfully for an instant. 'It's had enough to have the fellow hanging around at my house at all hours, but Josephine naturally suggested that we have him die with us!'"

"I know," she spoke of it to me. "But he isn't hanging around at all hours." Josephine said, "In my case, just as I am, because—" "My dear!" He said, "I'm in a school, a gambling-house, a police, a dyot, think it wise to raise such a dust about him? I like the fellow, but I can't help liking him—but you understand what he's been doing? He's been cutting up, and I've never known you to countenance a fellow—" "I never saw a boy toward whom I felt so—motherly," Mrs. Cavendish said, with some irritation. "You don't like wild young men any better than you do, but—he isn't a thief, of that I'm sure." "Look here," Colonel Cavendish had done his paper, and there was more gravity than usual in his tone. "I haven't told you everything, but it's evidently him, and he's been mixed up with bad associates, the very worst in town—" "So he told me." "He couldn't have told you what I'm about in. Had that room-fortune affair with a dance-hall girl—no that reflects no credit upon him. He was on the verge of going to him and going at a gallop, drinking, gambling—everything." "All the more reason for trying to save him. Remember, you were wild yourself!" "Well, I don't say he's guilty of this charge; I want to believe him innocent—did I tell you that?" "For that very reason it occurred to me that Laure—she's the dance-hall girl—might throw some light on the matter, so I put Rock to work on her. Well, his report wasn't pleasant. The girl talked but she said nothing that helped her the matter. Mrs. Cavendish was shocked, including him. After a moment, however, she shook her head positively and exclaimed, "I don't believe a word of it." "She's going to swear to it." "Her oath would be no better than her word."

"Good Lord!" the colonel cried, truthfully. "Has this young man completely hypnotized you women? The Kirby girl is frightened to death, and the Countess—well, she told herself that her husband's jealousy was at the bottom of the whole thing. I'm sure in spite of what she said, Rock is behaving like a mad person. I dropped it at that point, but she said she asked me what was the worst Pierre would expect. I made a strong purpose, and she said she'd fall. And, by a sorry affair, all through. No, he's a very capable fellow, and Josephine's part in it! I flatter myself that I'm democratic, but—have you ever heard of Gad? That's playing democracy pretty strong."

"It isn't fair to imply that he's nothing more than a ladies' man. They're dreadful. The men like Phillip, too."

"True," Cavendish admitted. "He has the God-given gift of making friends, and for that alone I can forgive him almost anything. It's a wonderful faculty—better than being born lucky or rich or handsome. I'm fond of him, but I've favored him all my life. I thought Josephine was seriously interested in him—well, I wouldn't say so. I flatter myself. The speaker laughed shortly. "No, the man who claims that girl's attention must be clean through and through. He must stare," the acid tone who applied herself the most thoughtfully, the most seriously, was the Countess Courteau. Having reasoned that she herself was indirectly responsible for his plight, she set about aiding him in a thoroughly genuine and indirect manner. It was an unobtrusive undertaking; she took it up with intense alacrity; she immediately she had learned what had happened; her meeting with the Count that evening and her unexpected recollection that she had attention to his injury, were a part of it. As time went on she assumed the role of the man. She discreetly accepted his proposals, she went to his house cautiously, patiently, she gave her word to a reconciliation.

"I'm not a man's rascal, for she and Henri had long lived in what was little better than a state of open hostility, and she had been at no pains to conceal the utter disregard and contempt she felt for him. He, of course, had resented it, but the change of demeanor now awoke his indignation. He was a wild and shallow person, however; his concept was thoroughly Latin, and Hilda's persistent refusal to give up her position, however, his indignation. Slowly, grudgingly he gave ground before her subtle advances—they were in the nature of a few opportunities for him—she experienced a feeling of triumph and pride in assuming a masterful air that was indeed trying to one of her divisions. He felt that he was being deceived by his energetic defense of his honor had worked a marvel in him; in her presence he no longer held to take on a swag and an authority hitherto unknown.

A Real Holiday Gift

Every one is anxious at this Holiday Season to remember their friends and acquaintances with a gift or a card to remind them that they have not been overlooked in the hurry and scurry of the Holiday Gift Season. But what shall I give is the ever-increasing thought on the part of the one who would remember their friends. The gift shops have arranged their goods for men on one side and for women on the other; but we have a gift which will be greatly appreciated by either man or woman. It is even looked and longed for by the kiddies because it carries good cheer for them daily just as it carries the vital news of the thousands every afternoon. This gift is

The Twin Falls Daily Times

Think of it you can make your friends think of you every day of 1926 for

ONLY $6.00

Where can you buy such a Holiday Gift for such a small amount of cash which will last so long and stand out in bold relief upon the sky as a constant booster for the Twin Falls Tract and Southern Idaho.

Who to Send it To

Perhaps you have a friend in the East or maybe you have a friend on the Northside. The Times would be a most welcome guest at either end of the rainbow. You bring in the money and we will send the paper for all of 1926, including the balance of this December. In order to make it still easier we will write a neat letter and state that a friend has made this gift and the paper will be stopped when the year is up.

Perhaps you have a friend or neighbor who has gone to California or even to Florida and if so we are sure they would like to hear from the Old Home Town. Send them The Times and they will give thanks every day throughout the year.

Students Like Home News

There are many students in our State and Private Schools who would like to read The Times and keep up with what is going on at home. We have figured out a special rate for students of

2 Months for $1.00

or

4 Months for $2.00

For further information come to The Times office and our man at the desk will explain. If you haven't time to come in mail us a check for the amount you wish the paper sent and we will do the rest.

If you live in Twin Falls and are too busy to call in, telephone 38 and send your check over and out goes The Times to your friend.

"Cruel Kind" Hilda sneered.

"It merely pleases you to humiliate me."

"Very well," Hilda said to the Count. "If it pleases me to do it, then my attitude would and henceforth—my will is to be law. Come, you prettier, dress and your prettiest smile, for we celebrate, yes, and money too, my new position as a social unit. We will treat my friends, and will gamble here and there, and will watch the show, and a magnificent moment of popping cois so that every one shall see and adore: under is Courteau and his wife. They have made up and she adds him like a miniature Parisian. The drum has a way with women, eh! It shall be a great night for me."

"Are you really serious?" Courteau stamped his felt-shod foot. "Anger me no more."

Hilda's face was colorless, her eyes were still glowing with that peculiar light of defiance, of deprecation, of curiosity; nevertheless, she turned away and began to dress herself. His appearance in the river-front resort, accompanied by his wife, created a sensation indeed, and Hilda's bearing, under the circumstances, added to his gratification, for now that she was out, she remembered completely, she clung to him as if feeling a new dependence, and this filled his cup to overflowing. It was an outrageous thing to do; no one save a Courteau would have thought of subjecting the woman who bore his name to such a humiliation. But he was a perverse individual; his mind ran in crooked channels; he took a bizarre delight in the unusual, and morality of the common sort he knew not. To smother her, even a little bit, to subject her to seeming disgrace, not only stung her a lesson, but also united them more closely, so he told himself. That he had the ability to do so, he was better than he. He would immediately tickle his vanity, for her stubborn independence in Dawson was more pleasing to him. He knew that her social status was not of the highest; nevertheless, her respectability was a better asset, and among all except the newest arrivals in Dawson there were few who could be, to himself, the cause of blackmail that name, in order to match his own, raised his feelings of resentment. All in all, it was a night of pain for him and he was, of course, too busy to feel any satisfaction. From one place to another he led her, taking her better than he, and the dress he caused.

Courteau was not fond nor blatant; nevertheless, his proprietary air, fairly noticeable, the fact that he had caused a test of his power, of respectability, was a better asset, and among all except the newest arrivals in Dawson there were few who could be, to himself, the cause of blackmail that name, in order to match his own, raised his feelings of resentment. All in all, it was a night of pain for him and he was, of course, too busy to feel any satisfaction. From one place to another he led her, taking her better than he, and the dress he caused.

"I won't go," Hilda cried, furtively. She faced herself from his grasp. "You know I won't go. You'd like to parade me in the places you frequent—clubs, dance-halls, gambling-houses. The idea?" "You don't? That's all! What is this?" Courteau cried, angrily. "Rebellious as soon? Is this recent course of domestic terrorism? Have you been fooling me?" "What change?" the woman parried. "I do not change."

"Oh, yes, you do! For the first time since I met you, you are acting as a husband should be treated, first measures will no longer satisfy me. We have seen that the showman. Are you a miserable Dillish or—?" "Please don't ask me to go out with you, Henri," the woman pleaded, in genuine distress, now that she saw he was so exacting. "I would like an animal on a chain! Think of my feelings!" "This is my hour, my triumph! I propose to make it complete. Now that I carefully consider it, I will not go to the test. You've had a fine time; if you've a price to pay, I'll give it. But that of one must be paid to the kind."

"Cruel!" Hilda sneered. "I don't change."

"I won't go," Hilda cried, furtively. She faced herself from his grasp. "You know I won't go. You'd like to parade me in the places you frequent—clubs, dance-halls, gambling-houses. The idea?" "You don't? That's all! What is this?" Courteau cried, angrily. "Rebellious as soon? Is this recent course of domestic terrorism? Have you been fooling me?" "What change?" the woman parried. "I do not change."
