THOMAS JEFFERSON'S BIRTHDAY

BY JAMES D. WHELAN.

When the Jefferson club, assisted by the Democratic Women's club, puts on the program in honor of the nativity of the author of the Declaration of Independence at the Parish Hall tomorrow night, homage will be paid to man who not only founded the democratic party, but who contributed what is best in both great parties. Lincoln was the greatest expositor of Jeffersonian doctrine in regard to individual human rights, and every sentence in his famous Gettysburg speech was based on the principles of his eminent precursor. On the other hand, Lincoln's celebrated rival, Stephen A. Douglas, found in Jefferson's principles, the doctrine of local self-government, which he called "squatter sovereignty," and which now arises under the guise of opposition to federal bureaucracy.

Our republican friends have recently unjustly sought to make Jefferson the father of modern protectionism; just as some enthusiastic democrats have erroneously sought to make Lincoln a protagonist of the historic tariff policy of democracy. Jefferson was in principle a follower of the free trade theories of Adam Smith, while Lincoln was a professed protectionist. When the British fleets were destroying American commerce, Jefferson put on an embargo, not on the theory that hampering of foreign commerce was a good thing, but on the theory that it would hurt England more than it would us and bring that nation to terms. Admitting his advocacy of free trade immediately after the Revolution he said: "We have experienced what we did not then believe, that there exists both profligacy and power enough to exclude us from the interchange with other nations." In other words, when we were deprived of the right of exchange we must as practical people, produce ourselves, even under circumstances that are normally unconscious and unsatisfactory. There was no change of principle in this. He advocated what is now called reciprocity, namely, "moderate duties for those favorable to us and higher duties to those who are not."

It is absurd to assume the man who loved agriculture and who lived up to the principle of "Equal rights to all; special privileges to none" would tolerate for a moment the present tariff of which the Corn Belt Farmers' committee last December said, "The staggering burdens imposed upon the consumers of the country through this act fall as heavily on the farmers as upon any other class—on the one hand the farmer pays his full share of the heavy tariff tribute upon practically everything he buys, while on the other hand the price of his great surplus commodities is fixed in the great world market." So active has this organization been that the Illinois legislature, both houses of which are overwhelmingly republican, passed resolutions saying that "There is practically at all times a production of wheat, corn, hogs and cattle and their products greater than home or domestic production and . . . as a result a tariff on such products at no time benefits or helps the producer."

That is not the sort of revenue system for which Thomas Jefferson would have stood had it been proposed, which it was not then by anybody, for the tariff question in its modern aspect, of permanent protectionism, instead of protection for infant industry, did not become a defined issue until 1832, six years after Jefferson died, when Andrew Jackson signed a bill scaling down the high duties of the tariff of 1828.

If alive, Lincoln would doubtless oppose the present interpretation of protection as strongly as the Illinois republican farmers do.

Nor do they reason better who say because Jefferson advised against entangling alliances with old world despotism, that he, who in 1803 was willing to form an alliance with England against Napoleon, should the latter keep Louisiana, would today oppose entrance into a disentangling alliance of free nations for the peace of the world, such as that drafted by his great successor, Woodrow Wilson.

FARMERS FAVOR SUGAR BEETS

Elsewhere in this issue is to be found the advertisement of the Beet Growers' association relative to why the farmers should plant more sugar beets. To try to add further reasons to this—why would be like "carrying coals to Newcastle" or bringing "Dutch to Holland." The beet sugar crop is a method of diversification that will appeal to all who accept the statements of men who have tried and who know what they are talking about. In asking those who have land to read what they have to say, the Times has done all it can do. Their arguments appear to be convincing.

(Through on oversight this editorial ran in a few western papers Saturday, prematurely, owing to the impression that the ad ran that day).

Miss Nobody

Barbara Brown, more beautiful than she wants to be—for her sweet parents never let her think she was ugly—and she's just one dime, accepts an invitation to a New Year's party from a chance acquaintance, the mysterious Mr. O'Bradley. She arrives in the morning to find her hostess not well in the night—and the housekeeper gone. Her phone buzzed when Hamlin didn't wait for an answer. She was gone.

Barbara puts this mysterious call to her mother, grandmother, and doctor to bear. In a panic she writes to her father who has deserved criticism for his past conduct in the South Pacific Islands, asking for advice, but the letter is destroyed per orders from the Chinese, mentioned earlier.

She goes to the police station to file a complaint, and does not dare to touch the police who have called her a "queen."

"Can it be possible that Webb, our gas the lady is envious!" Hamlin has been supplanted by a brandy snifter of cakewalk optimism, who is said to be carrying on all the best traditions of the days next to d'Amour, to the matathation of the capital?

"So we can only commented," said Nail, "Lucky punch indicates you've got a lot to learn."

Often Barbara had enjoyed the spicy little screen comedies of Tootie Tootie. They were fine, when they were about other people. Now the breakfast tray, held in her hands on the counter, gave suddenly an alarm.

*She let the copy of Twin Falls Times fall and rubbed her hands with a gesture of washing.*

"Oh, J. B., I'm frightfully afraid of you."

She caught a glimpse of him again in the long glass doorway.

"What a relief! I've been so plagued, more apprehensive than any of the multitude of parasitic doubts which had assailed her during the weeks she had spent at Hardiman's uninvited, chafing in the house at McKeynes; more unpleasant even than the venomous squall she had just read.

"I don't think she knew she had someone—the desire to cross swords with herself. She might have wept, repaid further. She did neither. She sat down cross-legged on the carpet to inspect her unspotted self.

She thought: "I'm very myself, just in this long quiet underclothing. How long would I stay here if I knew she had another person?"

"I'm worth nothing better than what he offers. Less than that! That's the way it is. Even the most honest cheat for them. If an accident of nature had not made me a little queerish, I'd be a little like a street-walker. I've lived eighteen years and all I can do that a street-walker can do, is to work and earn my living and manage an artichoke hollandaise."

"My nose was full of danger to herself. It was the mood which Hardiman was awfully. Right, when I thought herself face down on the velvet carpet and went to sleep."

"Then Hannah found her and gently lifted her up on the back porch into her chamber. Hardman said she had struggled to retain her consciousness, "you there," soothed Hardman. "I know just how you feel."

"Yes," Hardman spoke dryly, "And what would you advise to do?"

"There's only one thing for you to do, Mr. Hardiman"— "What?" Hardman flushed red, then white, then red again. "And another? How many sisters?"

"I can't give you any information. I'm engaged to Mr. Hardman, and—"

"You might do worse," said the housekeeper.

From a distant corner of the room both of them heard the faint burr of a phone.

"That's your phone," said Hardman. "It's Mr. Hardiman calling."

"Yes, it's Mr. Hardiman."

25 SUCCUMB IN PORT EXPLOSION

The death toll was expected to reach 25 by noon.

An tank No. 2 of the freighter, which was being loaded with 200,000 gallons of gasoline, exploded at 2:30 o'clock Sunday morning. In that blast about 200 persons, mostly men, were killed or wounded, most of the dead being members of the dock crew.

Overflowing of No. 2 tank and evaporation of the gasoline with a steaming liquid blamed for the explosion.

Tragedy in Berlin.

Twenty-four men were caught in the bath by the change of floating ejection and were burned so severely. Some were killed by their steel splinters while others attempted to escape jumping overboard and drowning to shore.

Of the dead, 16 are unidentified.

Only means of identification of most of 16th number is by means of dental marks. The other eight are known and those bearing the marks are:

Only two of the dead men are identified. One is Frank Tyler of Port Arthur, member of the dock crew, the other is Charles A. Koser, insurance agent. Both of them were in the ship as soon as it was loaded enough for rescue work to begin.

M. E. Carroll, member of the loading crew, was one of the first to return to go aboard the Gulf of Venezuela after the blast, told of his experiences. He said the explosion occurred in after tank No. 9. Gulf Refining Company has electric apparatus and engines of Port Arthur reported immediately.

The first was put out and the ship cooled sufficiently by about 7:30 for rescue crews to board her. They found many bodies in the cabin. Those charred bodies were found near the bunk room door. Over that charred body, another stood. Still a third man was found within some of the charred remains.

Another body was found on the deck. Others were found on the ship's deck. Carroll explained that as the ship's gasoline tanks took fire, some of the fuel had leaked into the air for a hundred feet.

He said that the Gulf of Venezuela says the only ship being loaded early yesterday morning and for that reason the gasoline in the gas line was stronger than usual.

The explosive threw flames over the dock, over the entire ship and over the channel itself, Carroll concluded.
