The awfulness of the European war does not come with this force to the people of this country engaged as they are with commercial, juristic and a safe distance from the horrors of which will soon be enacted in a half-dozen countries hereafter, more actively engaged in industrial manufacture.

The killings and maiming of thousands which must surely happen before Europe is pacified, happen to this country because of the happy conditions which exist here as a nation. Yet the thousands of the younger of civilization must spurn anyone who considers the films' protest upon which Germany, Russia and France engaged in war this week. Deep down in the minds of all races is the primal impulse to control, to dominate and take by brute force the things coveted. In that respect, Europe today is but little above the less enlightened races as the facts leading up to the war are considered. Austria, due to territorial aggrandizement, declares war upon the weaker nation, Serbia. Instead of telling Austria to keep out and preserving the peace of the two countries, Germany, controlled by a warlike emperor with an ambition to imitate Napoleon, gives encouragement. Russia, with another ambitious war lord, says that Austria must not disturb the balance of power, not because of any love of Serbia, but for pure jealousy of Germany and German ideas on expansion. France and England together with every other power concerned is also ready to fight in a war that should terrify every one. All of the power without one good sound vital principle at stake in the issue. Not an insinuation of national honor is concerned in the causes which lead to the war. Nothing of real purpose in aiding enlightenment and progress, nothing of righteous anger for an oppressed nation enters into one of the worst world-wide wars of all history. The question of right and wrong has very little or nothing to do with the terrific combat which will wreck many nations, change the map of Europe and place many sturdy people perpetually under galling yoke and impoverish the common people to the extent that it will bring about even stronger armaments than has existed in Continental Europe. It will seem that in the years to come that a just judgment and punishment must come upon the monarchs who have thrown a civilized world in chaos for mere temporal power.

REMEDIES FOR THE DEEP FAMINE

As the supply of beef is now pretty generally affected by the price to the wholesale supply of cattle and the growing number of months to feed, so the price is suggested naturally by the shape of hints to the small farmer to go in for stock-raising, and intimates to the hobby to curb their hands for the fish-pots. While others are deeply impressed by the news that beef cattle sell at about ten cents a pound on the hoof in Chicago, which means that it is no mystery about such the as has rate per hundred pounds to retailers is "increased from 20 to 70 cents," still many of them buy themselves to find a remedy for this situation rather than with a mere attention to causes. Thus one authority, holding with others that we must raise more beef and be more economical in using what beef we have, says that "there is no mystery about such rise as has taken place recently in the price of meat, especially beef, in spite of the removal of duties from that imported."

It is interesting to note, in order directly due to a falling-off in the number of cattle received for slaughter at the great markets of the country. At the same time, we learn from the press, statistics prove that the number of people in the country who eat beef is greatly on the increase. Thus it is seen, we read in Journals of "protective" tendency; that it is not the tariff, but the law of demand and supply that "rules the great market," while some of those who believe in the new schedule of duties are of the idea that the big beef interests are making things difficult, if not impossible.

Such a charge as this is put in concrete form, we read in the New York Evening Post, by A. H. Benjamin, agent for the independent packers of Argentina, "who declares that he is in a position to supply beef at from three to five cents a pound under the domestic price" provided he can get the transportation facilities. "Mr. Benjamin's trouble," The Post says, "is that the railroads have refused to give him the facilities on the plea that the refrigerators are under their control were owned or leased by other packers."

This is a question, The Post remarks, that should have a thorough clearing up, though it adds: "It is interesting to note, however, that Mr. Benjamin, even up to the statement that, when as matters stand, had it not been for the imported beef, the domestic beef would have been at least four cents per pound higher wholesale." And so we come back to the point, which every other dealer in the subject world, consistently bears in mind, that the tribute which the packers pay to the railroads, and the combinations can restrict is limited by the conditions governing supply. We must do all we can to keep monopoly down, but for a check on the high price tendency, we must look primarily to increase of supply at home and facilitation of imports from abroad."

The New York Globe reminds us that the department of agriculture may be able to enlighten us on the present situation when it presents its report of the investigation it has been carrying on for the past few years. It fears that not much "that is new will be disclosed," because "it has been obvious for some years that we were approaching a meat famine. Grazing lands have been steadily giving place to cereal fields. The stock farmer has had no encouragement. He is more or less at the mercy of the big packers, who control his products as completely as they control the business of supplying the public's needs; Corn and wheat, with which to feed his animals, have been so expensive as to leave little for the rest of the year, and the slaughter of calves, for wool, nature or immature, there is a constant demand, and the farmer finds more profit in catering to them in trying to raise full grown animals."

Signed dispatches from several Chicago packers appear in this same journal, attributing the high cost of beef to supply shortage, while some of these authorities aver that "stoppage of supplies means necessarily a rise in price. But the Publishers through the Telegraph say that "The very argument is over-worked and weary as its chief-cut predecessor," and it continues:

"It is becoming more and more true that the beef we buy comes and is not continue to come from the land (if not from Argentina and Australia, purchased and prepared for market from high priced hogs. Instead of from broad expanses where the cattle of the summer period picked up a living for themselves and their owner, it is more, than the beef, however roundly and drives to the nearest shipping point. The raising of the big cattle ranches and ranges tells the story of why slaughter costs as much as one could buy live, for in the year, the price of live beef is independent upon the farm and the farmer."

The meat situation may be a discouragement for today, admits the New York Press, arguing along a similar line, but it does "not despise a similar line, but it does "not despise for the future," because "There is an immense latent meat-producing capacity in American farms which at present are not developing their possibilities in this regard. They will be more and more disposed to raise meat, in view of the low price of wheat, the high prices of meats, and the improving conditions that will develop as progress is made toward the control of swine disease."

The New York Journal of Commerce, points out that "the tendency of higher prices will be to stimulate the raising of European animals, but the most effective defense is greater economy in consumption of high-priced meat. It may not be true that meat is not necessarily to be regarded as a necessary of life, at least for those employed in labor requiring muscular strength and vitality; but it is true that there is a great deal of waste in the use of fresh food in this country. There is much more consumed that is either unnecessary or salutary, but worse than that is the lack of economy in preparing it for the table and making refuse of much that might be utilized to advantage. Kitchen and farm economy, for which the French have such a high reputation, is little known in this country."

Not does the Detroit Times seem to be a humdrum tale, rather takes a unadorned tone when it writes that: "One of the reasons that meat is high now is that pastures and feeding conditions are good. This is not a profitable time to market stock. Meat does not keep well in warm weather. It does keep when it is cool. Summer is the time to grow it. Winter is the time to eat it. During the summer months there is provided an abundant variety of fruits and vegetables to take its place. Surely such a happy arrangement of circumstances was not ordained by an all-wise Providence without the expectation that man should profit by them. Therefore, if the price of meat wants to climb, let it."

We are also counseled by the Springfield Republican that "one of the sensible ways of escape" from beef price domination is to find substitutes for meat, "as thousands did several years ago" when prices soared, and it cites with approval a "foregoing remark of the Boston Globe."

"At the time it was demonstrated that human beings could refrain their health and strength by a diet which did not include a large supply of meat. In fact, many individuals, without becoming thorough vegetarians, are beginning to consume food that was palatable and better for their system than the meat products they had formerly considered indispensable."

WHO WILL PAY HUERTA'S DEBTS?

The measure of "Huerfian complications" is seen by some observers of the Mexican situation, who say they are sure to attract in the words of the Brooklyn Eagle, "there is any temporary with the part of the national debt incurred by Huerta, while a defecto president, not recognized, indeed, by the United States, but recognized by European powers." That there is a great temptation to repudiate this indebtedness The Eagle admits, because "the proceeds were used for the benefit of the United States."

"Constitutionalists," but it has killed confidence that Washington will make any provisional government that succeeds the "Carbolic makeshift" meet this obligation in full. As to Huerta's other engagements, in particular, his concessions to nationals of foreign governments, we learn from Washington dispatches that the United States does not intend to "recognize as valid any concessions granted by Huerta, even those to Americans." The debt, however, is a different matter, about which the Brooklyn paper says that "Mexico must see that it does not afford national bankruptcy," and it adds:

"The best history parallel for the kaleidoscope changes of form of government in Mexico is offered by France. The revolution that overthrew Louis XVI. and had to fight all Europe could not be more than a passing all the annuities that kings had lavished on favorites. It stated down such charges. It repudiated debts. It made some debts payable in annuities of debased value or mandate which were little better. But the policy was not one of repudiation. And when the monarchy came back after the fall of Napoleon it accepted all the obligations incurred by the republic and the empire. Since that time there has been no attempt at repudiation in France, and French credit is superb."

"Mexican rebels will do well to study the financial history of France. It offers the very best guide for them when they come to power. If in guidance is accepted, the United States will not have to interfere to protect European bondholders."

At the same time we read in a Washington dispatch of the New York Tribune that the French government of today is becoming concerned about the "interest of the nationals in Mexico, and such 'nationalism' is considered an 'forerunner of general unsteadiness' among the European powers. This is made 'doubly certain,' the Tribune correspondent tells us, because of Secretary Bryan's revelation that the United States 'intends to divide Huerta's regime into two parts, so far as the legitimacy of his actions is concerned,' and the writer adds:

"Secretary Bryan's brief statement . . . indicated that the administration would not approve nor support claims growing out of any action by Huerta since October 10, 1913. It was on that day that Huerta dissolved congress and assumed the powers of a dictator, and would call out every particle of his government. It is understood, that at that time the United States informed Huerta of its intention no longer to consider legitimate or binding any action of Huerta."

In this connection The Wall Street Journal calls attention to the announcement of General Carranza that he "proposes to ignore" the debts of Huerta, and observes that it "raises one of those disturbing problems which are likely to prove more difficult in the ultimate solution of the Mexican situation than the 'cash of arms.'" Consequently this journal points out that:

"The government of the United States may well proceed deliberately in the policy of extending further force to the Constitutionalists until something is learned of the limitations of this policy of throwing overboard the obligations of the Huerta government. It will probably be advised by General Carranza that obligations incurred by General Huerta for the purpose of paying interest on the old Diaz loans should be excluded from the list of repudiation. Other items may be more difficult to adjust to the natural satisfaction of the parties in interest."

"In so far as local partisans of Huerta voluntarily advance money to maintain his sway, there may be a separable defense for the policy of repudiation. The difficulty is, however, even in these cases, that it is not always to be claimed, and pretty nearly established, that advances were made under duress, which would constitute a legitimate claim for damages against any administration, which claims to be responsible for the orderly government of the Republic. Along these lines inextricable labyrinthine open of legal contention and diplomatic correspondence."—Literary Digest.

The man who wants to see for himself what he is buying, and to decide whether it is suitable for his purpose, is displaying good judgment.

To buy building material "sight unseen" isn't sound business practice.

The right kind of a lumberman takes plenty of time to show you ever variety and quality of his merchandise. The way to tell is to see the goods.

FILER NEWS.

(From the Filer Journal.)

Earl Walker and Roger autoed over to Wendell last Friday.

Geo. Allen and wife drove to Oakley last Sunday in their car.

Filer's public drinking fountain is the best patronized enterprise in the town.

Dr. Hack's father and a friend named Sutton, from Illinois, are here on a visit.

Harry Dinkelacker, the electrician of Twin Falls, was a Filer business visitor last Monday.

Dr. Newberry has purchased the three lots that join him on the south, and some time in the future expects to improve them.

J. F. Blakely has sold his 40 south of Filer to Geo. Lancaester. Consideration, $100.00 per acre. Case and Anderson made the deal.

It is reported that there will be a big peach crop in the Snake river canyon this year. Especially fine are the Alberta peaches, which will probably be marketed in about four weeks.

One day last week, while H. H. Schillman was getting out of a wagon, a cuff on his hand caught in the brace on the side of the box and threw him violently to the ground spraining his ankle. He was laid up for several days, but now able to get around with the use of a cane.

Last Friday the earlier in company with Cago & Anderson and Elmer E. Francis drove to Oakley to attend the annual celebration of Pioneer day. The day was a delightful one for an auto ride, and nothing occurred to mar the pleasure of the trip. A big crowd was present to enjoy the sports and other means of entertainment prepared by the people of Oakley. The country looked fine and the crowds of a life-long stay on is assured.

Mr. Graves and wife, of Kansas, parents of F. C. and R. T. Graves, are visiting here. It will be remembered that they spent a summer here once before and the memory of Idaho's splendid summer weather was indelibly etched on their minds. On Wednesday evening Mrs. George Price and two children of Milton, Oregon, a sister of Mrs. Graves arrived for a visit here.

Dr. Carner started for Jerome and Shoshone last Thursday on a motorcycle. He says if the Lord will forgive him for trying such a trip in the summer months of Idaho, and the hot sands of Hades, and the waterless area of a burning desert, he will never again be caught on such an errand. He is the doctor of travel, he was first known in getting his swollen tongue back in place, and his disposition was so improved that he doubts if he will be decent company again to the human family. Of course, the doctor still loves his dog, but another hour on the North Side tract would have alienated his love for even a bull dog.

Dr. Newberry is on the sick this week.

Threshing is the almost universal order of the day here, and the Sheriff Vandusen and W. P. Guthrie, of the county seat, were in town Tuesday.

The second cutting of alfalfa is about all in the stack, and a splendid crop it was.

A little daughter was born last Wednesday to Mr. and Mrs. Peter Ehler, of Maroon.

Mr. Wilcox, the new barber, has rented the J. D. Fisher property across the track.

Barry Dean has purchased a 40 west of Filer a half mile, from James Bues, of Twin Falls. They will use it for a pasture.

Dr. Evans, his sister, Miss Pauline, and her friend, Miss Martin Johnson, were Filer visitors last Thursday and Friday.

W. T. Shotton has purchased a Maxwell and will teach his children how to run it so they can attend school either at Filer, or some other point on the next term opens.

H. C. Dickerson, wife and baby, of Twin Falls, Miss Alberta Simonsen, and Miss Nevada Mosely were camped at Filer, and having a good time last week up near Holeey.

Mr. Wilcox, who came from Oklahoma to Kimberly about three months ago, is now located here, having bought an interest in the White Palace barber shop. He is well recommended by those who know him.

E. E. Hackett, is an uncle of Dr. Douglas, is here looking after business interests. Mr. Hackett has been here several times, and is an admirer of the Twin Falls country.

Col. Hanson and wife, from Lincoln, Nebraska, who have been visiting their son on the tract, left Monday in their car for home. They made the trip over here of 3,000 miles in a Hudson six and had but one puncture on the way. They were delighted with southern Idaho, and they come again next year.

The bank has just installed one of the latest adding machines. It is called the burroughs bookkeeping machine, and adds, multiplies and subtracts. With the aid of this machine, the bank is able to handle the business of the bank to a much greater advantage, and with much less trouble than under the old system.

Prof. Dooley left last Saturday for the Filer where he has a number of wild horses that he desires to round up. He expects to find the maver at the track ridge, wherever that is. With him are, Chas. McCaffrey, William Mohr and John Williams.

The town of Filer, which was the first of the eight center money. The real, like the big fish, got away.

J. J. Hallenau and R. L. Eyster, of Thomas, Oklahoma, are here looking the country over with a view to locating a new home.

Mrs. Frances Hovey-Paul was in town Monday inspecting the price of eggs and butter, and incidentally greeting her friends.

H. P. Hanson, of Ellensburg, Washington, has purchased the borderland southwest of Filer, of 100 acres. This is a fine piece of real estate and he made the deal.

Chas. Reynolds and wife returned last Friday from their visit to Lava Springs. They enjoyed a splendid out-as his weary legs could carry him. He always carried the key. Once in his room he unlocked, fresh wearing apparel, shoes, and changed. Then he proceeded downstairs, and the second hand bit still shading his eyes and the upper part of his face.

MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY By Harold MacGrath

At half past 12 Norton entered the Knickerbocker eat-restaurant, and the first person he noticed was Braine, reading the morning's paper, propped up against the water cafe. Evidently he had just arrived, for there was nothing on his plate. Norton walked over and laid his hand upon Braine's shoulder. The man looked up with mild curiosity.

"Why, Norton, all down at down! Have you had lunch? No! Join me."

"Thanks. Came in for my breakfast," said Norton, drawing out the chair. Braine was sitting with his back to the wall on the lounge-seat.

"I wonder if you newspaper-men eat a real true enough breakfast. I should think the boys you lead would kill you off. Anything new on the Hargrave story?"

"I'm not handling that," the reporter lied cheerfully. "I didn't want to. I knew him rather intimately. I've a horror of dead people, and don't want to be called upon to identify the body when they find it."

"Then you think they will find it?"

"I don't know. It's a strange mishap. I'm out on the story, mind you; but I was in the locality of Duffy's warehouse late last night and fell into a gunnium-cannus."

"Yes, I read about that. What were they after?"

"You've got me there. No one seems to know. Some cock and bull story about three being something valuable. There was."

"What was it? The report in this paper does not say."

"Ten thousand bags of coffee."

Braine's back in his chair and laughed. "If you want my opinion," said Norton, "I believe the gunnium went to another gang, and the police got wind of it."

"Don't you think it also then the police called a halt in this gunnium-matter?"

"O, so long as they got each other the police look the other way. It takes a long trial and passage up the river. Besides, whenever they are nibbled some big politician manages to open the door for them. Great is the American voter."

"What was Mr. Norton's order, Luigi," said Braine.

"A German panache, battered toast, and coffee," ordered the reporter.

"Man, eat something!"

"It's enough for me."

"And you'll get all the rest of the day on tobacco. I know something of you chaps. I don't see how you manage to do it."

"Food is the least of my troubles. My stomach may I ask you a few questions about the coming?"

"Fire away."

"What do you know about the Princess Perloff?"

"Let me see. H'm. Met her first about a year ago at a reception given to Nessimov. A very attractive woman. I see quite a lot of her. Why?"

"Well, she claims to be a aunt of Norton Hargrave's daughter."

"She said something to me about that the other night. You never know where you're at in this world, do you?"

The terms of the matter the coffee disappeared, and the reporter passed his cigars.

"The president visits town today, and I'm off to watch the show. I suppose I'll have to interview him about the tariff and all that sort. When you start on a new book let me know and I'll be your press-agent."

"It's a bargain."

"Thanks for the breakfast."

Braine picked up his newspaper, smoked and read. He smoked, yes, but he only pretended to read. The young fool was clever, but no man is infallible. He had not the least suspicion; he saw only the newspaper, reporter. Still, in some manner he walked stonily upon the truth, and it would be just as well to let the reporter's hands effectually.

The reporter's quick winking had been subjected to a rapid quick winking. Norton, out of the way temporarily was only a very precaution; it was not a matter of spite or jealousy.

He paid the reckoning, left the restaurant, and dropped into one of his clubs for a game of billiards. He drew quite a gallery about the table. He won easily, racked his cut, and sought the apartment of the policeman.

What if a piece of luck it was that Olga had really married that old clown, Vergott? He had left her in a cold sweat six months after her marriage. But he had had hardly a word to say to her since.

"Olga, Hargrave is alive. He was there last night. But someone is watching the girl and had the police in waiting. The question is, has he fooled us? Did he take that millions of dollars he hid? There is one thing left to get that girl. No matter where Hargrave is hidden, the knowledge that she is in my hands will bring him out into the open."

"No more blind alleys."

"What do you mean?"

"She has never seen her father. She confided to me that she has not even seen a photograph of him."

"There was a long pause."

"Do you understand me?" she asked.

"By the Lord Herra, I do! You're a head on you worth two of mine. For the simplicity of the idea will win out for us. Some ooooooo ooos as her father; a message handed to her in secret; dire misfortune if she whispers a word to any one; that her father's life hangs upon the secrecy; she must confide in no one, least of all Jones; the butler. It all depends upon how the letter gets to her. If it drops in the country, she probably will get her window open. A public attack to a note, tossed into the window. I'll trust this to no one; I'll do it myself. With the girl in our control the rest will be easy. If she really does not know where the caught Braine above the ear, knocking him out. When he regained his feet the roughs of a motor told him the rest of the story.

By the dim light of her bedroom candle Florence read the note which had found entrance so strangely and mysteriously into her room. Her father? He lived; he needed her! Alive but in dread peril, and only she could save him! She looked to try to him at once, then and there. They could also wait till tomorrow night at 8? Immediately she began to plan how to circumvent the watchful Jones and the careful Susan. Her father! She slept no more that night.

"Heaven forbid!" he murmured, jangling his hands.

All the while the letter hurried against her breast; and the smile on her face and the gape on her tongue were frozen. "Confide in no one," she repeated mentally, "or you seal my death warrant."

"Why do you shake your head like that?" he asked.

"Oh, I shake my head! Her heart fluttered wildly. "I was not conscious of it."

"Are you going to keep your promise?"

"What promise?"

"Never to leave this house without Jones or myself being with you."

"You must return home and bring me the money," went on the watchful guard to perpetrate such an act. "It is all that stands between me and death."

Then she knew! The instant daily warnings came home to her. She understood now. She had deliberately walked into the spider's net. The faintest of terror, an extraordinary calm fell upon her.

"Very well, father. I will go, and get it. Gently she released herself from those horrible arms."

"Wait, my child, till I see if they will let you go. They may wish to hold you as a hostage."

When he was gone she tried the doors. They were locked. Then she crossed over to the window and looked out. A nap from there would kill her. She turned her gaze toward the lamp, wondering.

The false father returned, dejectedly.

"It is as I said. They insist upon sending some one. Write down the directions I gave to you. I am very weak."

Write down the directions yourself, father; you know them better than I. Surely she got no creature, she was determined to keep up the tragic farce no longer.

"I am not your father."

"So I see," she replied, still with the amazing calm.

Braine, in the other room, shook his head savagely. Father and daughter; the same flesh in the nerves. Could they herd? Would they have to work her? He did not wish to figure her badly, but a million was always a million; and there was no way which was worth more to him than the money itself. He listened, motioning to the others to be silent.

"Write the directions," commanded the round face which regarded the broken man stolidly.

"I know of no hidden money."

"Then your father dies this night? Grouse put a white to his lip. "Sign, write!"

"I refuse."

"Once more. The moment I lose this while the men in the other room will understand that your father is to die. He was. Susan is cutting; life is everything."

SHE CHANGED TO LOOK INTO THE CRACKED MIRROR. IN IT SHE SAW SEVERAL FACES.

"money in Hargrave will tell us. Great head, little woman, great head. She does not know her father's handwriting?"

"She has never seen a scrap of it. All that Miss Farlow ever received was money. The original note left on the doorstep with Florence has been lost. Trust us to make all these inquiries."

"Tomorrow night, then, immediately after dinner, a taxi will await her just around the corner. George is the best man I can think of. He's an artist when it comes to playing the old man parts."

"Not too old, remember. Hargrave isn't over 45."

"Another good point. I'm going to stretch out here on the divan and snooze for a while. Mind a devil of a time last night."

"When shall I wake you?"

"At 4. We'll have an early dinner next morn. I want to keep out of everybody's way."

By 11:30 in less than three minutes he was sound asleep. The woman gazed down at him to wonder and envy. If only she could drop to sleep like that! Very softly she pressed her lips to his hair.

At 11 o'clock the following night the hall light in the Hargrave house was turned off, and the whole interior became dark. A shadow swept through the black beams with out any more sound than a cat would have made.

Florence's window was open, as was a window which had expected it to be. With a small string and stone as a sling he sent the letter whirling fully through the air. It whirled into the girl's room. The man below heard no sound of the stone hitting anything, and concluded that it had struck the bed.

He waited patiently. Presently a winking light could be distinguished over the sill of the window. The girl was awake, and had in her hand this knowledge was not do the rest, that is, if the girl came from the same pattern as her father and mother—arrogant, wild and adventurous.

He tiptoed back to the divan, when a noise sent him close to the ground. Half a dozen feet away he saw a shadow creeping along under the front door. Presently the shadow stood up as if listening. He stooped again and saw lightly to the steps, up three to the door, which he hoped.

Who was this? wondered Braine. Patiently he waited, scanning his posture so that he could get a look at the door. By and by the door opened cautiously. A man, blind as a mole, appeared. Braine's rapidly recognized Olga's description of the burglar. The man on the veranda suddenly blew out the light.

Braine could hear the low murmur of voices, but nothing more. The conversation lasted scarcely a minute. The door closed and the man ran down the steps, across the lawn, with Braine close at his heels.

"Just a moment, Mrs. Hargrave," he called ironically. "Just a moment!"

The man he addressed as Hargrave returned with lightning rapidity and struck. The blow

"My Darling Daughter—I must see you. Come at 8 o'clock tomorrow night to 78 Grove street, third floor. Confide in no one, or you seal my death warrant."

Your unhappy "FATHER."

What child would refuse to obey a summons like that?

A light tap on the door started her. "Is anything the matter?" asked the mild voice of Jones.

"No. I got up to get a drink of water. She heard his footsteps die away down the corridor. She thrust the letter into the pocket of her dress, which lay neatly folded on the chair at the foot of the bed, then climbed back into the bed itself. She must not tell Mrs. Norton.

Was the child spinning a romance over the first young man she had ever met? In her heart of hearts she did not know.

Her father?

She was going to say her father.

All day long Jones went about like an old hound with his nose to the wind. There was something in the air, but he could not tell what it was. Somehow or other, no matter which room Florence went into, there was Jones within earshot. And she dared not allow the least impatience or restiveness. He was a large order for so young a girl, but she liked it.

She rather expected that the reporter would appear some time during the afternoon; and sure enough he did. He could no more resist the desire to see and talk to her than he could resist breathing. There was no use denying it; the world had suddenly turned at a new angle, presenting a new face, a rosiate villain. It rather subdued his easy banter.

"What news?" she asked.

"None," replied despondently. "I'm sorry. I had hoped by this time to get something. But it appears that I can't do any further than this now."

"She did not ask him what he meant by that."

"Should I play something for you?" she said.

"Please?"

He drew a chair beside the piano and watched her fingers, while as the ivory keys flitted up and down the board. She played Chopin for him, Mendelssohn, Grieg, and Chaminade; and she played them in a surprisingly pleasing manner. He had expected the usual school-girl chords and execution; instead the moonlight Sonata (which he had a dozen great pianists never played correctly), Monastery Bell, and the Blue. He had prepared to make a martyr of himself. Instead he was distinctly and delightfully entertained.

"You don't," he said whimsically, when she finally stopped. "You don't, by your change, know 'The Maiden's Prayer'?"

She laughed. This piece was a standing joke at school.

"I have never played it. It may, however, be in the music cabinet. Would you like to hear it?"

"I couldn't if I wanted to. I'll wager Jones is out there in the hall this minute. I know; it is all for my sake. But it bothers me."

Jones was indeed in the hall; and when he sensed the perturbation in her voice, he shoulders sank despondently and he slipped shyly at the door.

At quarter to 8 Florence, being alone for a minute, set fire to a veil and stuffed it down the register.

"Jones," she called excitedly. "I smell something burning!"

Jones dashed into the room, sniffed, and dashed out again, leaving for the outer door. His first thought was naturally that the devil incarnate had set fire to the house. When he returned, looking of course, disheveled on fire, he found Florence gone. He rushed into the hall. Her hat was missing. He made for the hall door with a speed which seemed incredible to the bewildered Susan's eyes. Out into the street, up and down which he looked far away he discovered a dazzling taxicab. The cab was gone.

In the house Susan was entering the telephone, talking impulsively.

"Who is it?" Jones whispered, his lips white and dry.

"The princess," began Susan. He took the receiver from her tongue, and held it to his ear.

"This is Olga Perloff. Is Florence there?"

"No, madam. She has just stepped out for a moment. Shall I tell her to call you when she returns?"

"Yes, please. I want her—and Susan and Mr. Norton to come to tea tomorrow. Good-by."

Jones, being up the receiver, sank into a chair near by and buried his face in his hands.

"What is it?" cried Susan, terrified by the highness of his face.

"She's gone. My God, those wretches have got her! They've got her!"

Florence was whisked away at top speed. Her father! She was actually on the way to her bedroom, which she had always loved in dress, yet never seen.

Norton's dress-suit was not an unattractive place, but when he arrived she was too highly keyed to take note of it. Her dress was really, she felt the lamp and looked it in the face, quite indifferent whether it had been worn or not. She would have turned them and there and there but for the wall picture she had of a well-dressed man at a table. He lay with his head upon his arm.

"Father!" she whispered.

The man raised his careworn face; so very well done that only the closest scrutiny would have betrayed the front of the theater. He rose and staggered toward her with outstretched arms. But the moment they closed about her Florence experienced a peculiar shiver.

"I refused! Even as she had known this she had to be to an impostor, as she knew that he had, that her father was still free. Florence had the whole. # Human Documents of Married Life

Intimate and Human, Intensely Alive, Each Story Presenting a Problem Which Might Occur to Any One of Us at Any Time

WHY WE ARE LIVING TOGETHER

ONE'S partner expresses surprise that one marries out of every dozen ends in divorce or separation. To my way of thinking, the marriage that is the most successful is so small. I have wondered at it times without number. Yet John Wallace and I still live together. Perhaps other couples have reasons for their staying together which, so far as the world can see, have kept us a united pair for all these years.

Marriage without love is a crime. I have known many marriages in which the parties to the contract have ceased to love each other. I live together under such circumstances only that in a question which I ask myself often: How do I protect what I have made of my life? I was twenty-five years old when I married. I had been a teacher in a public school in a suburban town to which John Wallace came expecting to spend that year on a house for the wife of the owner of the house had been kind to me, and, through her, I met the successful young architect. At the end of the year we were married.

That I was in love with him I did not doubt. I know that he loved me, for, if not, why did he marry me? He was a man who married, John and I went to the city to live. I loved the metropolis and the busy, rushing life there, and I doubt if any bride was ever happier in her new home than I was at that time. John was older than I. He was thirty-three when we were married. During his bachelor days he had made many friends, some of whom I liked and others of whom I did not. I was agreeable to a man who to them all I did not fancy this idea. Now that I was independent of the need of populating members of a board of education, or the wives of school trustees, I wanted to enjoy the life of a woman who was not married to be especially nice to rich people in the hope that they might, as John said, "give him a job." I told him this when he regretted that I had not made myself agreeable to a man by whom I had chanced to sit at a dinner party the night before.

"He has influence, and can get me a great deal of work," explained my husband. "I've done it," I asked. "I've owned a lot of property that is increasing in value and as the relations between him and me grow better and the word 'work' in colloquial, naturally motion my desire to be married. I made plans for the buildings they expect to put up. Moreover, he is interested in city affairs, and by advising managers of public institutions to engage my services, can show three or four dollars a week. He has had no other should have been nice to him. And you weren't I kept an eye on him and you scarcely talked to him at all.

"I know that," I said, irritated at this criticism of my manners. "He talked of nothing but himself and his money. That kind of thing is not good form." He reached the subject the next morning. "Isabel," he began, "you're not doing so well as you should be. You made yesterday. You may recall that I took his wife in to dinner the same night on which you snubbed her husband. Well, she is a nice little thing. I told him you were a man who said she would like to know you better."

"Oh, dear," I protested, "they're such ordinary people—who are their husbands?" "They're laughing good-naturedly," "Oh, dear," he mused, "they're such sentimental people—and her husband! So be nice when Mrs. Welch calls." She came, and I was as pleasant as I could be to a woman, with no success had nothing to comment. The next week she wrote, asking us to dine with her ten days later.

And just behold was with one of many all-gorgeous, all but long trains, all cut low—some to the point of indecency. Jewels sparkled from necks, wrists, and collar, and studded gowns revealed fingers loaded with rings. I felt like a meek and short-tailed white Leghorn hen in a poultry yard, and I could not help but think. With this thought in mind I looked across the table to where John sat next his hostess, chatting as if he had been brought up in this set. This little irritated me. I shook myself out of it, reminding myself that I was better here than those people, and, meeting John's winking glance, turned to the man by whom I sat and talked to him as fast and as thoughtlessly as my tongue would permit. "Only," I said, "what a dreary evening it was! And yet, as men came in from the dining room, and I suggested to John that it was time to leave, he looked generally disappointed and expressed surprise at the kind of the hour. In the car on our way home he asked me: 'Well, did you have a good time?' 'I can't remember,' I said slowly, 'that in all my life I ever had such a time as this. The women here were the greatest beauties I ever knew. They think that life consists in buying clothes and jewelry. The men and women are common, though, and through."

John looked at me for a moment, then said, "I'm glad you enjoyed it. And this was my appreciation of my sacrifice! I thought it over that night and wondered if any man was ever so well treated. A few days later when John told me of an order he received from Mr. Welch to submit to him plans for a new country place, I only remarked that I was 'glad some good came out of an such discomfort.' has forgotten the request before he reached the front gate. "At this time Sarah's fingers had torn the blue paper which she had pinned over the door. Beneath the lid which she lifted was a mass of plums—yellow, purple, and crimson—rows of luscious peaches and clusters of golden pears. An envelope lay on the table. Sarah's shoulder as she drew forth the card it enclosed. The words leaped up to me. "For the dearest of little sisters—From a brother John Wallace. I am so glad you are so happily and contentedly settled in the house. Sarah ran after me. "Isabel!" she exclaimed, "You are not angry, are you?"

"Of course not," I answered, trying to speak lightly. "Only," I said, "it is amusing to see how John remembered your hints for fruit, and forgets my requests for it." "I told her," he exclaimed, and even in the dim light, I could see his eyes sparkling. "You were creeping upon me like a ghost, Isabel! I thought you were to bed long ago." "I slipped suddenly," and which have you been?" "Down on the veranda, smoking," he answered calmly, turning on his right side, and looking at me as he burst forth, nonchalantly winding his watch, the picture of a man at peace with himself and the world at large. "I longed to disturb his equanimity."

"What a lovely time!" I exclaimed, "I'll have a plan!" he declared, "I ran over to your husband to take a ride with me, but since he is not here I will take some one I would rather have; namely, his dear little wife."

"Where's Mrs. Welch?" I asked little by little. "Away on a visit to her sister, so I am, for a few days, and an odd bachelor who comes and goes, and who is not to be depended upon in such a matter as your ladyship."
