A gate doesn't seem important enough to make much fuss about.

Still—if you had overheard the remark as we did, "By golly, that's a good gate—that farmer's up to scratch—but he has a good farm,"—then you would probably look around and see in what shape your own gates were!

Little things like that certainly do a lot toward making a place look shabby or up-to-date.

The lumber does it most much—and ours is the right kind—makes a good substantial job.

Pioneer Engine Foreman of O. S. L. Killed at Kenner.

While trying to escape from a car that had been derailed, and falling under another and being cut in two was the fate of Sam Tulin, foreman of a switching crew near Kenner, Wednesday evening, according to the advice received at the office of the Short Line office.

It is feared that the crew was taking the engine and being cut in two by Kenner, and that Tulin was riding in the lead box car. A quantity of ice was encountered on the track, derailing the engine. Tulin and other members of the crew made a rush to get out of the car when they saw it was going to leave the rails, and in doing so Tulin stumbled, not getting out of the door and onto the rails in time for the second car to pass over him. He was killed instantly.

He was a resident of Kenner and had long been in the employ of the Short Line at that point—Times Leader.

SNOW SHORTAGE SERIOUS

Fall Unusually Light at the Headquarters of Snake River

The past season has been noticeable for the unusually light and general snow winter. While it has been very desirable from an agricultural standpoint, particularly for the raising of sheep and cattle on the range, the absence of moisture is one which is causing some anxiety among the dry farmers.

What and general grain conditions are now at this time on the great dry farm belt, but an early spring, followed by warm and windy weather, has made the moisture out of the soil, it feared.

There has been even some question about the amount of snow affecting the soil in the Snake River valley, but as this section has never felt a shortage in that way that "condition" is hardly satisfied.

It may be that there will be a shortage in water for irrigation purposes on sections farther down the river. Visitors from the Island Park section near the Yellowstone park report a light snow-fall, as do visitors to the Jackson hole section.

The dry farmers have experienced favorable seasons for the past number of years until that bunch of agriculture has been extended and has become a great industry and need for this section of the state. It may be that the ground in a number of cases has been so dry in such condition that the moisture which has fallen in the form of snow with the early spring rains which may be expected, will be unable to penetrate the soil, or at least an average crop—Idaho Falls Register.

road ahead of her than, by all the forest noise.

"She thought for a moment of rushing into the thicket and hiding until the man should pass. Or should she run back to the house? No. That would be absurd and undignified. This might be one of the house party for all she knew, and they would never see her laughing at her. So she walked on, a little nervously.

At the figure of the man appeared around the bend, her fears vanished. He was a mountaineer, grizzled and the muscles of his neck on a cane, that he seemed almost helplessly.

"When he saw her he stopped abruptly in the middle of the road. His eyes were fixed on her, and she thought he was about to speak, but he fell to the ground as he held out his trembling hands to Pauline.

"Oh, lady! Heaven has sent you. You will help us."

"She drew back, but she noted for the first time that in his eyes of excited hands he held a slip of paper. This he now pressed toward her with an appealing look. She took the note and read the faint scrawl.

"To my woman."

"Please come at once. I need a woman's help. MARY GARVIN."

The mountaineer watched her breathless. He was muttering and dropping as if from a long journey.

"You will come, lady? You will save my wife."

"I will run back to the langloos and get some one to drive us to your house. Wait just a minute."

"Oh, no, no, lady. No one can drive. It is on the mountain. We can only go by path. The steepness would not allow there is on time to lose. My wife is dying—alone."

He commenced to sob piteously.

"Please do not weep, my lady. But if there was apprehension in her heart, the sense of charity and duty overcame her. She turned and said bravely.

"Very well, lead the way," she said lightly.

He looked his joy and gratitude as he stepped back to the road, Pauline following.

About a quarter of a mile from the McCallan homestead the crippled mountaineer turned off to the right, his path so overgrown and overwinded with verdure that it was scarcely discernible.

The path led up the mountain, but it soon seemed to become no path at all and Pauline marvelled how the man could find his way.

"How do you know the path?" she asked curiously.

"By the blessed tree—see," he answered, pointing with his stick to a clipped trunk beside them.

They went on. It was remarkable with what speed the mountaineer, crippled as he was, could find his way across through impending bushes or fallen trees and around the huge rocks that dotted the mountain.

Pauline herself was already nearly exhausted. Her dress was torn and face and hands scratched by the clinging moss and ferns. Her feet would not step up now. Her errand of mercy was to be futile.

Suddenly the mountaineer uttered a cry of pain and fell forward on the ground. His foot had caught in an exposed root. He lay groaning and clapping one of his ankles in evident pain.

"Is it broken?" she asked, half-horrified.

"Yes," he answered, wincing. "But I can't go any farther. Go on, lady, go on and help my wife for the love of pity."

"How will I go on?" she questioned, faintly. "I do not know the way."

"Follow the blessed tree. You can't miss it. It will take you to the cabin. Go, lady, go."

"But I cannot leave you injured here."

"You can't carry me, either. I will wait until you come back or send some one to get me. I'm no good, any more. It's my wife I wish to save."

"You are brave and kind," she said. "I will do my best to reach your wife."

"God bless you," he answered fervently. "The angels may fly through the folds of undergrowth, but I shall with alert eyes for the clipped tree trunk did not find it difficult. They were plain and near together. What surprised her was that they seemed to be freshly cut. From general the same was the case with the other trees.

"I probably made the trail this morning on the way down the mountain."

Pauline leaned close to his arm, companion and spoke in whispers.

Owen bowed assent and stepped out of the thicket.

"When will he be master?" the spy asked pottily.

"When the opportunity is yours. There is plenty of time."

Pauline asked restlessly. The injured shoulder was by no means painful, although she would have died rather than tell Harry about it.

She fretted till the soft morning wind of the mountains blew in the dawn.

She arose and peered through the curtains upon the waking world. The birds were singing in the forest, the bullfrogs croaked their rattling notes, and the sunbeams glistened across the mountain's gray fangs.

Pauline was thrilled by the solemn majesty of the scene. She turned and began to dress with joyful stealth.

The house was silent as she crept down the stairs. She reached the door in her escape. No burglar, trained could have taken greater care in opening an unlocked door.

But in the sweet silence and the silence she breathed deep of the pine-scented air. The dewy freshness of the forest called her. She started toward the door.

The rattle of a muskrat in the tank grass started her. A great owl, angry with the sunrise, faded like a white-winged bat into the deeper dungeons of the wood. A stock called from the lake-side.

"She was afraid, yet fascinated. She went on up the road."

The day grew brighter as she advanced. The flowers lifted their heads by the wayside. The pines whispered in the breeze. The woods were no longer gloomy; they were friendly and kind to the mountaineer's.

"There were only four that I thought

PERILS OF PAULINE

Owen stood in the automobile. No one was visible at the fourth jump. He's losing ground."

But firstly seemed to suddenly grip his strength as one horse passed him. He pulled himself forward under Pauline's urging. He regained the lead.

"I came down splendidly toward the homestead. The horses of the powerful beasts rose one by one over the last high ridge."

"They're over! They're over! Owen led his horse. They're down."

Leading at the last jump, the dragon heart of the great horse had conquered his courage. As he crooped heavily, Pauline cut over his head and lay helpless in the path of the other riders.

Harry dashed madly toward the track, but he closely far from her, had to turn away his head as the crowding hoofs passed her. When he looked again, attention was centered on her swiftly to the clubhouse. He sped toward it, Owen following.

Harry tore his way through the excited crowd to the side of Pauline. A doctor was administering restoratives. Pauline opened her eyes and looked about her bewildered. She saw Harry's anxious face and smiled contentedly.

"I've learned—a lesson this time."

"It is nothing serious, her shoulder bruised a little," said the doctor.

"Thank Heaven," breathed Raymond Owen, with excellent emotion.

"But as we walked to the door his brows were knitted in a frown that could not have been born of rejoicing.

CHAPTER XXV

Outside Cattle Marvins a touring car was waiting for a far journey. Its steel heart; its steel throats uttered like an airplane being throbbing; for the joy of flight.

Through the Western portion and down the marble steps came Pauline and Harry. Pauline's maid and Farrell, the chauffeur, came after their carrying luggage.

"It must seem mighty strange to you," said Harry as he helped Pauline into the machine.

"What have I done?" she asked, innocently.

"Something terrible—no fear."

"In going to the world old adventures, where they don't have anything but mountains and goats?" Do you call that terrible?"

"I do. And you have made me a lumpy man—maniac, by Jove, you haven't!"

Harry had turned at the sound of steps on the walk and beheld just the tall, stately form of Owen in motor dress and cap with a suit case in his hand.

"Why my dear lady? Well, I'd like you to reason to say that you asked HIM to come along?" demanded Harry in a hot whisper.

"I have no objection," Owen said, but vacation in years."

"What do you think the McCallan can do to do with HIM?"

"IDAHOME"

The Flour of Quality

It has long been a well established fact that Idahome leads, especially among the best bakers and in homes-where-quality-is desired.

Idahome is made from the choicest wheat grown in Idaho and the result is the best flour on the market today.

Just try a sack and note the difference in your bread, cakes, rolls or anything you care to bake—it will be a delight to you.

Idahome is put up in twenty-four, fifty and one-hundred pound sacks and is very moderately priced when quality is considered—in fact it costs you no more than inferior grades.

When ordering your groceries tomorrow be sure that you include a sack of Idahome flour—try it along with the brand that you have been using, we're sure you'll be pleased—if not, return it to your grocer—Idahome is guaranteed.

—at all good groceries.
