DARK JUNGLES

THE STORY: Allison Topping, society girl, is off in Guatemala, to run her father's cattle plantation. Barry Fielding, mining engineer in search of a quick fortune, has tried many times to dupe her. At last, Barry, who is her father's attorney, Renaldo, she wants Allison to marry her and promises to do all he can to help Barry.

TOO DANGEROUS

The stunned confusion on Allison's face sent Barry into hoots of laughter. She ignored him, her wide violet eyes fixed on the impetuous face of the Spaniard. "What do you mean, 'A train of mules'?" she demanded. "Do you have mules pulling carriages or something?"

Barry laughed louder. Even Renaldo, thin dark lips struggled with a smile. "No, Miss Topping," he said gently, "the mules carry the luggage—and the passengers."

Allison's delicate chin lifted haughtily. "That's ridiculous," she sniffed. "There's a train. I saw it. I shall go on that."

Barry exchanged a helpless smile with Renaldo. "Do that," he said in a choking voice. "Tip the engineer and smile at him. He'll let you off the tracks and take you just where you want to go in the jungle."

She gave him a wide, mirthless smile. "Are you kidding?" she said. "I've been trying to tell you for five days I'm not kidding," Barry growled.

She turned to Renaldo and said, "Where's the hotel?" He pointed it out—a flat little building raised on piles just back of where they sat. Beyond it, corrugated iron shacks littered the clearing close to the high green rim of the jungle. In the distance, dogs, pigs, naked children were everywhere. In dirty, noisy confusion.

"I don't think I'd like it there," she said absently. "You think it's heaven after a few days in the jungle," Barry retorted.

She shrugged. "Who knows?" Barry gave it up. With an impatient shrug, he said to Renaldo, "I wish you luck with her."

Renaldo rose with a troubled smile. "Thank you," he said to Barry. "Now if you excuse me, I have many things to arrange before we can begin our journey. I will first have your luggage carried to your rooms. You will have no other worry. Make yourselves comfortable until tomorrow."

The waiter brought them more coffee and they sat on in the cluttered veranda, lazily watching the few small boats on the glittering blue water, while the sun shined higher in the sky and the heat poured down in heavy, moist waves. Small beads of perspiration glistened across the girl's wide forehead beneath the brim of her hat. She wiped them away furtively and smiled at Barry.

"Aren't you going to tell me it's hot?" she jeered. Barry grinned at her cheerfully. "I am not," he retorted. "I've turned you over to Renaldo and he knows. I've an idea I've been hindering you all wrong anyway. I'll bet you came down here in the first place because someone dared you to."

A secret smile twitched the corners of her mouth. "Maybe," she murmured. "After all, an owner has a right to manage his own plantation."

"Oh, it was Renaldo's letters then. He wrote you not to come."

"Well, practically."

"Renaldo is a smart man. I'll bet he's an efficient one," said the girl with a mischievous laugh. "Just the same a life to live. And if mine is yours, I shall live."

"Throw it away," Barry cut in dryly. "It's yours. Go ahead. Renaldo's letters are ready."

A fat little man in round white ducks waddled up the hill to tell them their rooms were ready. An hour later they met on the veranda to stroll back up to the small restaurant for lunch. They had both had showers and a change of clothes and for a few minutes they felt fresh, almost cool. The very young naked native population clustered around them, staring at Allison with round, dazed eyes at the daintiness of her silver blue cotton frock, at the wide gleam that flashed from the side of her face as she smiled at the delicate oval of her face.

"Well," Barry thought humorously, "she's a damned sexy mule than I am." Now that he had found she was in capable hands, he was no longer the nervous responsibility he had been on the boat. He was content to drop his own problems for the moment and concentrate on the remarkable prank of fate that had put him in this tropical village just one of the big city's clever dolls for a single afternoon.

"What do you want for lunch?" he said. "You'll get nothing."

"You make life so easy," she turned the full battery of her blue eyes on him in mock admiration.

They settled down into the bamboo chairs again and the waiter hurried from his stuttered explanations. They found that the thoughtful hand of Renaldo had been in the kitchen preparations. He brought on plates of soup, then chicken, rice and hot red peppers, and finally a bowl of fruit, mangoes, bananas, pineapple.

When the slanting rays of sun had lost their violence, they took a look around the town. They peered into closed streets, and watched the little locomotive where away from the small station hummed. Allison brought her camera and took pictures of the slender coconut palms that leaned against the boardwalk, and the perfumed breezes of their plumes with heavy break. She found with delight at each porridge, hummer, steadily across the sand before the water.

It was noon before they turned back. On the hotel veranda in the rose haze of the tropic evening pipe. Barry was smoking an evening pipe.

"Did you have an enjoyable day?" he asked.

"Not bad at all. Did you find that side for me?" Barry asked.

Renaldo frowned.

"I am sorry to say I did not," he said.

Barry stared at him. "But I thought you were sure."

Renaldo turned troubled eyes on him. "Remember," he said with slow emphasis, "the word has gotten out where you are going. These guides are not fond of trespassing into Quiche territory. I offered them fabulous sums."

"But how could it have gotten out?" puzzled Barry.

Allison was frowning herself with her red hat. "Barry, you having trouble?" she inquired sweetly.

Barry whirled on her in sudden suspicion. She blushed at his accusing anger. "I didn't," she cried. "That was a trick I missed."

"The only thing I could suggest," said Renaldo drily, "is for you to go with us into the plantation and like some guide. I have three, whom I know will go. If not, I'll go with you myself."

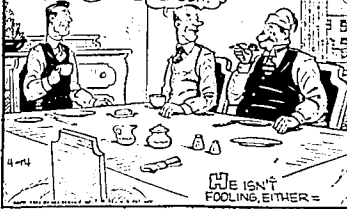

Barry stood, glaring in indignation. "A long way around," he objected. "But if it's the only way—"

Allison's mocking chuckle went on.

ARABS CELEBRATE CAPTURE OF CITY

By WILLIAM B. KING
KAIROU, Tunisia, April 14 (AP)—The fall of Kairouan to the Arabs was celebrated last night Sunday by the Moslem holy city's population, which stood in the streets and cheered arriving vehicles from the moment the outlines of their occupants could be seen in the darkness.

By daylight, 1,000 British troops were seen walking through the city streets for which Kairouan is famous. The trip was undertaken with great care because of the rumor that the Nazis had left large supplies of small arms in the hands of the Arabs, but not a single shot or unfriendly gesture was aimed at us.

We were amazed at because of our strange uniforms and a small group of dirty little children trailed chattering after us.

Volunteer Guide
We had gone only a short distance when a young man came to us. He was a person of some importance because he was wearing a shawl—shawl is a kind of a turban—and began describing landmarks in his native French.

At the Djemaa el Kebir (grand mosque), they rolled back a strip of gravel mat so we could enter without removing our heavy boots. Playing stopped while we were there, and the barefooted faithful gathered around in frank curiosity.

As we started out we passed the high courtyard of a pretty girl in rich white robes met us. He put a special flourish of cordiality into his handshake and then he told us the value of his job at the arrival of allied troops.

The German, he said, only created destruction and took goods without paying for them, and he and the Arab population were glad to see them in flight.

Important Man
"That," said our guide as we walked along the narrow streets again, "was one of the most important men in Kairouan. He has seen the grimace in Mecca and every night he prays for victory for the allies."

As the German army moved on, the eighth army joined the first army for the fight in northern Tunisia. The German army was followed by a couple of leaps and a radio car full of men in white uniforms, sun-baked garb of Kairouan.

Word of the arrival of the eighth army spread swiftly and the first army soldiers soon collected around the vehicles.

One of the thick yellow smoke on the faces of the smiling men who made a swift cross-country advance. An officer's luck had been the result of the scout car and explained that his column was a reconnaissance unit.

The main forces arrived later in the morning (Monday) and a few days after they arrived, they moved toward to join the first army in pursuit of the enemy.

As they left, a first army corporal said:
"You've got to give the eighth army credit. They are well equipped. They don't waste time getting forward."

River Break Threatened

Gooding highway district employees here are dumping rock and dirt to bolster support of the highway 40 bridge across Big Wood river north of Gooding. The raging current had bit into the bank under the bridge, allowing the roadbed to settle about six inches.

When the work abrid in progress was completed, it was thought the bridge would withstand the flooding that was yet expected. (Staff Photo-Engraving)

Ensign Says He'll Be Bitter Toward Complainers at Home

SALT LAKE CITY, April 14 (AP)—A former Salt Lake City ensign, who said he is about "a lucky fellow" when he is at home, said he found it "a little bit of a shock" to us out here in the Pacific to find that he is secondary to the European front.

"This is one of those things where a person writes to me and says 'I'm glad you're here' and I'm glad to hear that," he said. "I'm glad to hear that," he said. "I'm glad to hear that," he said.

TATE SUCCEEDED BY MRS. F. BERRY

GLENN PERRY, April 14—Mrs. Frank Perry has been sworn in as acting postmaster, succeeding H. H. Tate, who served as postmaster here since 1934 until his disappearance Tuesday, March 23. Inspector J. T. Cotton, Boise, administered the oath.

Mrs. Tate, who surrendered late last Thursday at Caldwell to John O'Malley, is now being held in Boise under federal charge of embezzlement.

Although Inspector Cotton has been working on the reports and records of the local office and the past two weeks, he has not completed his inspection sufficiently to make a statement as to the financial condition of the accounts. However, it is understood that there is a material shortage.

Mrs. Berry's appointment came after friends wired Sen. D. Worth Clark in Washington, asking her appointment.

A civil service examination will be held some time in the future to determine who will be regularly appointed. One of the three high constants will receive the appointment.

The subject, "The Implications of Peace," was discussed by a guest speaker, Philip Schaefer, assistant project director of the Minnesota relocation area. He covered briefly the background and organization of the evacuation of Japanese from the coast areas and followed it with some facts about the camp at present.

Among other things he questioned some rumors regarding equipment held at the camp and other supplies received. He discussed relocation of the Japanese from this camp to other areas, and said a great many have already been placed in different states away from the restricted area.

During the business meeting the nominating committee appointed was Nina Stuart, formerly president of the club at Rexburg, who is now living in Jerome. The next meeting of the club will be a luncheon on April 26.

Idaho's Teacher Shortage Acute

BOISE, April 14 (AP)—Increasing evidence that an "extremely acute" teacher shortage is probable next year in Idaho was found by C. E. Roberts, state superintendent of public instruction, on his recent tour of all parts of the state.

In every part of the state trustees of local school districts are being asked to go to the state to get more teachers. Roberts said. "The shortage this year was nothing to what it will be next year."
