

Census says Twin Falls grew 24% in '70's

By MARTY TRILLHAASE
Times-News writer

TWIN FALLS — Preliminary census figures for Twin Falls County show a 24 percent population increase in the past 10 years and a 37 percent increase in housing. Figures for Jerome County show a higher growth with a 42 percent population increase and a 51 percent increase in housing. In Minidoka County, less growth was reported with a 21 percent population increase and a 42 percent increase in housing.

In addition to growth, the figures also show that fewer people are living in the same households in those three counties. The average number of people per household in Twin Falls County dropped from 3.0 to 2.7 in Jerome County, the figure dropped from 3.09 in 1970 to 2.9 in Minidoka, the figure was 3.1 compared to 3.32 in 1970. Boise district census office manager Betty Parker said those figures reflect the rising number of single families, a lower birth rate and the increase in the divorce rate. Barker said the figures are not final and are subject to change. The office last week sent the preliminary results of the April census count to local officials. Those results were released Wednesday.

Barker said local officials have until July 23 to respond to the preliminary figures. So far the office has received no challenges to the preliminary figures. Census enumerators will remain in the field until early next week. Final figures will be released in late August, she said.

Preliminary census figures for Blaine, Cassia and Lincoln counties were released by the Census Bureau's Idaho Falls district office last month.

Figures for Gooding County have been received, but Gooding County Commission chairman George Lemmon said he would not release the figures until the entire commission has had time to review them. The commission is scheduled to meet Monday.

The preliminary count of Twin Falls County shows a total population of 51,728, up from the 1970 total of 41,807.

About 20,365 housing units were counted, with about 1,850 of them vacant. The Census Bureau recorded 14,929 housing units in the county in 1970.

The city of Twin Falls showed a population count of 25,314, up 15.5 percent over the 1970 population of 21,916. Housing units in the city numbered 10,447, with 704 of those units vacant. About 7,766 housing units were counted in 1970.

The city's population count may have missed several recent annexations and City Manager Tom Courtney said the city is now reviewing the figures. Parker noted the

Retiring GOP chairwoman attacks party

DETROIT (UPI) — Mary Crisp played the mourner at the wedding Wednesday. That was most unusual — and all the more dramatic because of it.

Rising to give her valedictory after 3½ years as co-chairman of the Republican National Committee — and after chairman Bill Brock had painted a rosy picture of the party's 1980 election prospects — Mrs. Crisp said: "Although our party has presented the outward appearance of vibrant health, I am afraid we are suffering from serious internal sickness."

The cause of this ailment in Mrs. Crisp's view are planks approved by a platform subcommittee that would endorse women's rights but not the ERA, and demand a constitutional amendment to outlaw abortion.

"I am deeply disturbed by yesterday's action," she said. "Our party has endorsed and worked for the ERA for 40 years. Now we are reversing our position and are about to bury the rights of over 100 million American women under a heap of platitudes.

"Even worse is the fact that our party is asking for a constitutional amendment to ban abortion. Does 'to restore protection of the right to life for unborn children' mean we will prevent poverty-stricken females — perhaps even an 11-year-old rape victim — from having an abortion?"

"I personally believe these two actions could prevent our party from electing the next president of the United States. My friends, I am sorry, but I cannot turn my back on these issues, and I feel compelled to do whatever is within my power to prevent these two tragedies from happening."

What that meant, she would not say. Asked if she would support Ronald Reagan, she said she does not know. She gave the same answer when asked about Rep. John Anderson, who announced as an independent candidate after his Republican nomination effort failed.

Her speech to the Republican National Committee won a standing ovation from its members — many of them supporters of George Ford.

Until recently, Mrs. Crisp, an Arizona national committeewoman who moved into the co-chairmanship in 1978, was one of many men and women, who work almost anonymously for political parties.

But among those who know what goes on under the hood of the GOP, she was regarded as one of the best at organizing women, not only for the tedious kind of jobs called "envelope stuffing," but as candidates and advocates of GOP causes.

She also was deeply committed to the ERA, taking pride in the fact her party has endorsed it at every national convention since 1940. This year, when it became clear the

Pray for a hurricane

Unusual weather causing heatwave

© 1980 The Baltimore Sun
WASHINGTON — Residents of the sweltering Southwest aren't praying for rain these days — what they want is a hurricane.

Because only a major weather disturbance such as the massive tropical storms that are normally a plague to Gulf Coast areas can shake loose the grip of the unique weather conditions that have kept temperatures above 100 for weeks now, with no end in sight. And even then it might not help.

The heat wave in the Southern Plains is caused by a combination of unusually strong high and low pressure systems that have produced a sweltering status quo, according to weather analysts.

Meteorologists for the National Weather Service point to five separate atmospheric conditions in the Northern Hemisphere contributing to the extreme heat which claimed three more lives Tuesday.

"There is a high pressure 'ridge' in the east-central Pacific. Occasionally such a ridge in the central Atlantic; a low pressure 'trough' off the coast of California; another trough off the East Coast and a high pressure system over the south-central part of the nation.

"That array of stationary weather systems is not unique.

"However, the thing that is unusual this year is that the ridges over the oceans are much stronger than usual and the troughs near the coasts are stronger than usual," said A. James Wagner, meteorologist in the predictive branch of the Climate Analysis Center of the National Weather Service.

"This combination will favor a stronger than normal ridge developing in the middle part of the country," Wagner explained.

Stronger in this context means that the high pressure in the ridges is higher than normal and the low pressure in the troughs is lower than normal.

Furthermore, Wagner said, the strong high-pressure system, or ridge, that has developed in the Southern Plains this year is suppressing thunderstorms. Thunderstorms are "the usual way this area of the United States gets rain at this time of year," the meteorologist added.

The high not only suppresses thunderstorms but the system contains air that is warmer and dryer than adjacent masses of air.

There are two other ways rain comes to that part of the Southern Plains: a tropical storm from the Caribbean or a cold air mass from the Northwest or Canada.

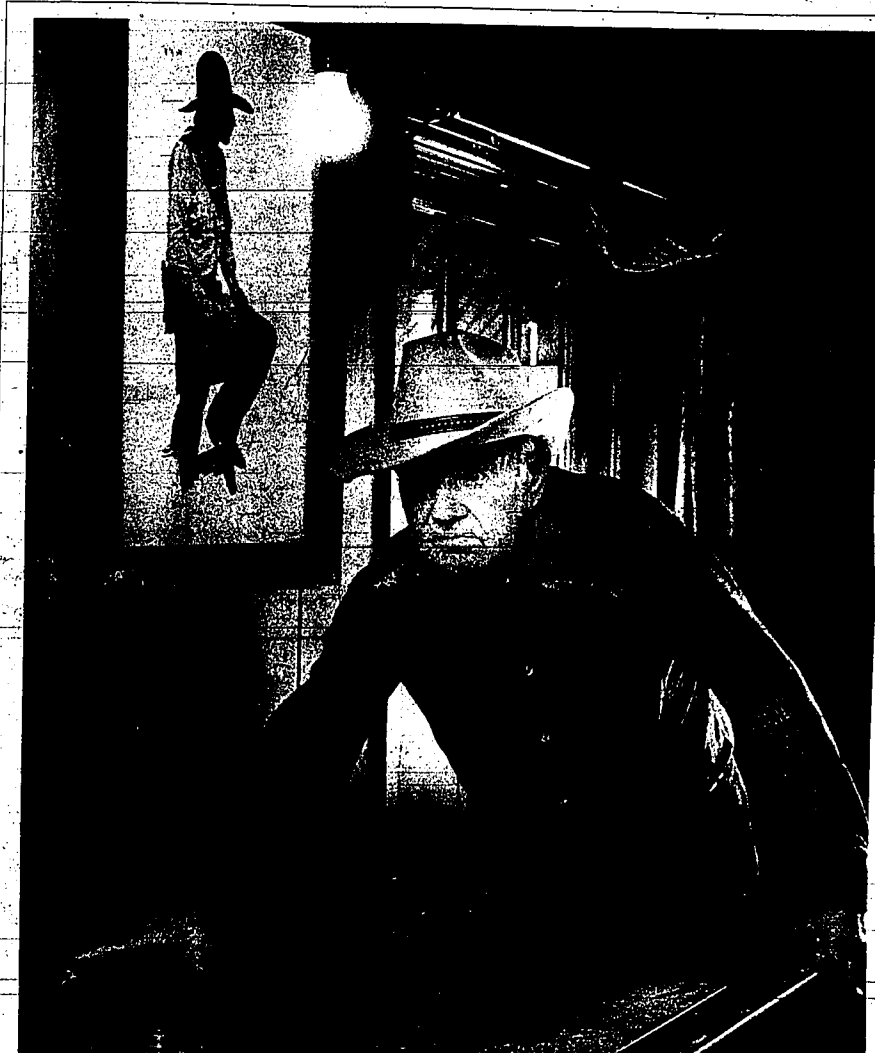

"This year, we haven't had any yet," Wagner said of tropical storms.

However, even if there were some storms blowing in from the sea, the strong high pressure system probably would prevent them from reaching the parched Texas and their neighbors.

Cold air masses from the northwest and Canada usually move through the Great Plains east of the Rockies and set up a slowly moving cold front zone in the Southern Plains, Wagner continued.

"The cold air comes down and lifts the warm air up," he said. In the process, moisture condenses and forms rain.

"The high-pressure system over the south-central part of the country is contributing to drought conditions there in another way, Wagner pointed out.

For years John Brooks has been utilizing his skills at shuffleboard to let other people buy him beers. He seldom has to buy his own

He's a shuffleboard hustler

By MARTY TRILLHAASE
Times-News writer

TWIN FALLS — John Brooks hobbles to the 18-foot-long wooden table, assuring his new opponent he's not as good at shuffleboard as he once was.

He moves slowly and apparently with some difficulty.

But, he assures his opponent, for the chance to win a beer, he'll gladly play.

A few minutes later, he strolls to the bar, enjoys his beer and waits for another challenger.

Brooks, who turns 80 next month, says he has played millions of shuffleboard games since he first started in 1944 and has usually won, despite the paralysis in the left side of his body from a 1936 mining accident.

"I shot with my right hand ever since I started playing shuffleboard. I'm the oldest shuffleboard player in town," he boasts. "I'll play as long as I can get up off the (bar) stool."

Brooks is something of an institution among shuffleboard players in this area. Nearly two decades have passed since shuffleboards became obscure and replaced in most taverns by pool tables. But a handful of tables remains in this area, most of them in small bars. There you'll find the old masters, who may start a game in the afternoon and not finish until the early morning hours.

The game is played on wooden boards or alleys 18-foot long and 18 to 24 inches wide. Players stand at one end of the board and take turns sliding metal discs or pucks to the other end. Points are scored by placing the pucks in marked off scoring areas near the end of the board. The closer to the end of the board, the higher the score.

The game involves skill and a considerable amount of strategy. The initial throws of each round are generally used to put pucks in scoring position, and subsequent throws can be used to protect a scoring puck or knock an opponent's puck out of scoring position.

At times, the stakes in these games have not been cheap.

"I bet I won more money and lost more money than anyone in town," Brooks quips as he leans over the table. He quickly adds that gambling is now illegal and that he only plays for beer.

Barbara Mills, a bartender at Freddie's Bar, said she remembers instances when Brooks has bet a $100 bill at a single game — and won.

"I thought he was crazy until he picked up the $100 bill off the bar," she said.

Brooks acknowledges he is no longer the best player in town. But his name is frequently touted by many players who were learning the game from him 20 years ago. Some are now considered to be the best in town.

Among them is Les Pehrson, a construction worker who dazzles spectators at the Hideout tavern by using both hands equally well.

"This is one game where you have to be ambidextrous," Pehrson tells newcomers. He stresses the advice.

Pehrson said the game's appeal for him is comradeship and competition.

"We'll get together and someone will get it started. There will be challenges coming up constantly," he said. "Pretty soon, you stay and you stay and it's 10 o'clock in the morning and you don't realize it. It gives you a feeling of accomplishment when you can hold a table that long."

Sam Thomas, owner of Sam's Chevron, 465 Addison Ave. W., is another player considered to be among the best in town. Thomas has been playing since 1958.

"It's more of a challenge than pool. You can be lucky with pool. You can be lucky in this, too, but you have to have some skill," he said.

Gene Harr, a plumber at the College of Southern Idaho, said his enjoyment of the game is a bit more simple.

"A lot of people don't know how to play it and I'm better than most," he said.

But the competition for Harr and the other old-timers may be on the upswing, Pehrson said.

"We'd like to bring it back. People are curious. I'm introducing it to a lot of young guys and they enjoy it. They'll sit in here before they'll go to the (pool) tables," he said. "Everytime you turn around, there's more players."

Brooks said he isn't so sure the game is on the verge of a comeback. For one thing, the boards are expensive and difficult to find. For another, many younger people were not even born when shuffleboard was in its heyday.

"Whether they play just one game or become addicted to the sport, 'to the generation that's coming around now, this is something new,'" Pehrson said, gesturing at the shuffleboard table. "All they know is pool."

As Pehrson speaks, a young pool player eyes the competitor at the long table. Perhaps the old-timers' next round will be on him.

Good morning!

GOP dilutes ERA platform

Rep. Margaret Heckler of Massachusetts said, "I intend to continue to fight. The party has not reaffirmed our historic commitment. It is extremely disappointing."

But Phyllis Schlafly, leader of the anti-ERA movement, said she was "completely satisfied" with the new language, and added "it's a good neutral plank."

Rebecca Lee, press secretary for the Republican Women's Task Force, said "It is essentially neutral language," and added that pro-ERA forces could take some comfort that at least their efforts were recognized as legitimate.

The Platform Committee scheduled afternoon and evening sessions to complete work on the document. There was general agreement on conservative planks on foreign, defense and economic policy — and only ERA and abortion sparked controversy.

Approval of the ERA plank came after Rep. Heckler and a handful of ERA supporters made impassioned but fruitless pleas to include the 1976 platform language — "We reaffirm our party's historic commitment to the Equal Rights Amendment."

"There is no way you can be for equal rights — small e, small r — if you are not for the Equal Rights Amendment," she said.

The final ERA language agreed to by the committee said: "We support the legitimate efforts of those who support or oppose ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment."

Mary Louise Smith, a leader of the pro-ERA forces, said she would seriously her supporters could gain the 27 signatures necessary to force the issue to the floor next week.

"I don't think we have the votes to take it to the floor," she said.

"No I'm not satisfied with the language but I am satisfied it was the best compromise we could get," Mrs. Smith said.

"This (compromise) gives me the right to work on behalf of ERA" within the outlines of the party.

Beer barrel protest

Los Angeles City Hall, as well as the White House in Washington, D.C., and many major state capitols throughout the country were picketed Wednesday to dramatize that Americans are fed up with the high cost of living.

Barrel-clad young women offered alternatives to the high cost of living with tips on coping with inflation, such as lowering grocery, utility and gasoline bills.

Census figures for other cities in the county showed Buhl with a population of 3,572, up 20 percent from the 1970 count of 2,975; Filer with a population of 1,594, up 36 percent over the 1970 count of 1,173; Hansen with a total of 1,061, up 156 percent over the 1970 total of 435; and Kimberly with a population of 2,256, up 45 percent over the 1970 count of 1,557.

The city of Jerome reported 2,654 housing units, up 58.5 percent over 1970. About 145 of the units were vacant. Population of the city was placed at 6,609, up 53.4 percent over the 1970 count of 4,335.
Housing units in Minidoka County totaled 6,868. About 643 of those units were reported vacant. The 1970 total for housing units was 4,916. The county's population was placed at 19,026, up from the 1970 count of 15,731.
In Rupert, the population was placed at 5,148, a 13 percent increase over 1970. Housing units in the city increased 31 percent, from 1,515 in 1970 to 1,988. About 119 of those units were reported vacant.

Mexico seizes U.S. tuna boat

SAN DIEGO (UPI) — The Mexican Navy seized a U.S. tuna fishing boat Tuesday, one day after announcing that Mexico intends to enforce a 200-mile limit.

The Maria Marie, out of San Diego, was seized 30 miles off the coast of the Mexican peninsula of Baja California and escorted to Mazatlan, tuna fishing sources here reported.

Mexico announced Monday it would seize any boat fishing within 200 miles of its coasts.

It was the latest development in a Mexican-American dispute over jurisdiction of coastal fishing waters.

Fugitive murderer arrested

NEW YORK (UPI) — Fugitive murderer Howard "Buddy" Jacobson was arrested Wednesday afternoon in a restaurant in suburban Los Angeles following a tip from authorities in New York.

The wealthy former horse trainer, who had eluded police for six weeks, was picked up by members of the Manhattan Beach police after they were called by Brooklyn District Attorney Eugene Gold, they said.

Police received information from Gold that Jacobson, 50, might be in the Criterion Restaurant. "We saw a subject who fit the description exactly,"

Mair said. "We asked him to identify himself. He said I'm Howard Buddy Jacobson."

Jacobson was making a phone call when police arrived. The officers hung up the phone and took him into custody. Mair said he did not know who Jacobson was calling.

Gold's office said Jacobson was traced through the phone call. The call, to an unidentified person in New York, had been expected, the DA's office said.

Freak Amtrak wreck kills 2

LINDEN, N.J. (UPI) — Two passengers were killed Wednesday and 19 were hurt, four of them critically, by a 15-foot piece of rail that crashed through a window of their car as it passed an "empty" work train, officials said.

Lois Morasco, spokeswoman for Amtrak, said the "Quaker City," a daily commuter train from New York to Philadelphia, was southbound when the 155-pound rail jutting off the work train snagged the first car of the six-car passenger train.

The 33-car work train, which showed on Amtrak records as being "empty," was northbound, she said. "It was just sitting there when it seemed like there were multiple explosions, and then a rail from another train or something came right in our car," said Bob McKay, of Philadelphia. "Parts of bodies were all over me, it seemed. It was just horrible."

Synopsis:
Mostly unstable air continued to flow over the Intermountain region from the southwest Wednesday as little movement is associated with the trough of low pressure off the West Coast.

Mostly fair skies prevailed over the state early Wednesday, and the few high clouds that formed were high. The only precipitation reported were some thundershowers over the central mountains.

Temperatures were warmer Wednesday than for the past few days, especially in southern Idaho. Spraying winds for Magic Valley indicate 10 to 15 mph with a few stronger gusts in the afternoon and evening, decreasing to 8 to 12 mph at night. Strong gusts near any thundershowers.

Pan evaporation is expected to be .33 today and .30 Friday.
The haying outlook for Saturday through Monday calls for dry, with temperatures near to a little above normal.

Joined by policemen and firemen, striking Detroit municipal workers stage a downtown protest

Detroit strikers enjoy support as talks go on

DETROIT (UPI) — Hundreds of sign-carrying union members, including police officers and firefighters, rallied with striking municipal workers Wednesday just blocks from the site of next week's Republican National Convention.

The show of support for the 9,000 city employees who have been off the job for nine days came amid expressions of optimism from some union officials that the contract dispute might be settled within 48 hours.

The walkout, which began at midnight June 30, has halted garbage collections, idled city buses used by an estimated 200,000 daily commuters, and hampered a number of other municipal services.

Detroit Labor Relations Director Mark Utley said the walkout could be settled "in half an hour" if both sides did some "hard decision-making."

Should the walkout drag on through Monday, when the convention opens, Utley said city officials had several options — including legal action and firing the strikers.

The strike threatened to take on more severe proportions for a time Tuesday as leaders of 17 other unions, including police and firefighters, pledged to honor AFSCME picket lines.

But after a meeting between Mayor Coleman Young and Metropolitan Detroit AFL-CIO President Thomas Turner, the unions agreed not to disrupt the GOP convention.

Turner warned that the unions have power to shut down the city.

Volcano shudders from small quakes

VANCOUVER, Wash. (UPI) — Mount St. Helens seems to be quaking with a new wave of seismic activity, but scientists say they don't know whether the tremors are significant or whether the volcano is readying for another major eruption.

Geologists also say the tremors, which began Sunday night, are so far too infrequent to be classified as a "seismic swarm" that has been known to precede eruptions of other volcanoes, mostly ones in Japan.

A series of six earthquakes, ranging in strength from 2.0 to 3.2 on the Richter scale, shuddered up from 3 1/2 miles beneath the earth's surface Sunday evening and were followed by quakes measuring 2.0 at 4:30 a.m. and 4:30 p.m. Monday, said Liz Bjorkman, spokesman for the University of Washington Geophysics Department.

Other tremors known as "Class B" earthquakes sent smaller vibrations through the area around the mountain, Bjorkman said.

"These quakes are possibly due to readjustment of stresses in the Mount St. Helens region related to recent volcanic eruptions," she said.

"It's kind of like a house settling, something like that. The volcano jolted the area — twisted it around a bit. Things kind of tend to settle down after that."

Steam rose to 12,500 feet from the mile-wide crater floor, and spores in Forest Service aircraft reported that a lava dome which had swollen to 220 feet in height following the volcano's third eruption had stopped growing.

"Mount St. Helens erupted with a giant explosion on May 18, spewing ash as far away as Montana and killing as many as 60 people.

Major eruptions occurred again on May 25 and June 12, each time spewing ash hundreds of miles

Scientists start watch on nearby volcanoes

PULLMAN, Wash. (UPI) — The Washington Department of Natural Resources has started taking closer looks at such Cascade peaks as Mount Rainier and Mount Baker so as not to be "caught napping" by another volcanic eruption.

Livingston, the department's chief geologist, told a Washington State University conference Tuesday that the state should have been more prepared for the devastating May 18 eruption of Mount St. Helens, which killed dozens of people and caused hundreds of millions of dollars in damage.

"People in the valleys around the mountain should have known more about what could happen," Livingston said, reminding that geologists Dwight Crandell and Donald Mullineux predicted two years ago that Mount St. Helens would erupt in this century.

Livingston said Mount Rainier, Mount Baker, Glacier Peak and Mount Adams all exhibit "heat features" that could point to possible future eruptions.

"We don't want to be caught napping again," Livingston said. "We can't stop eruptions, but we should be able to develop a disaster plan to eliminate the possibility of a large loss of life."

Livingston said an eruption of Mount Rainier has the potential of killing 100 times more people than Mount Baker.

"It's the most dangerous mountain in the chain because all of its major valleys empty out into the populous west side," he said. "Can you imagine a mud slide coming off Rainier down the Puyallup River Valley?"

In addition to preparing a general disaster plan, Livingston told the 150 scientists attending the Mount St. Helens conference that more information is needed on mud flows.

"We need to develop computer models on mud flows," he said.

"Some of the mud flows that ran out on ridges. You'd expect them to follow valleys, but in some cases they rode the ridges. It shouldn't have been, but it was."

Livingston said his staff would develop "worst case scenarios" for all four mountains cited.

Also to address the conference was Donald Lawyer, an Army Corps of Engineers official in Portland. He said sediment traps will be installed on both the north and south forks of Toutle River to catch sediment before it enters the Cowlitz River.

Lawyer said mud and ash has cut main Toutle flow to 13,000 cubic feet per second, down from a normal flow of 70,000 cfs.

"We hope to have the flow up to 60,000 cfs by Nov. 1," he said.

Lawyer said the corps will ultimately spend about $165 million to dredge navigation channels in the Columbia and Cowlitz rivers before winter, and another $30 million to help restore the Toutle.

Conference participants were also told about a WSU survey of eastern Washington residents, with a majority of respondents expressing the belief that another eruption will occur.

But most respondents indicated they were not really upset by the May 18 eruption, and they had no intention of moving from the area.

Alternative fuel projects set

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The Energy Department Wednesday parceled out $200 million in subsidies to 110 firms, municipalities and individuals as part of a $2.7 billion program to develop alternative fuel production projects.

The largest individual grant of $25 million went to Publisher Industries of Ohio for an alcohol-making venture with Ashland Oil.

Among the other major awards, North Dakota's troubled Great Plains Coal Gasification Project received $22 million, and Texas Eastern Synthels received $24.3 million for development of its proposed 55,000-barrel-a-day coal liquefaction.

Forty-four proposed alcohol fuels projects received about $55 million, of which 16 percent went to small or minority-run businesses, acting Energy Undersecretary Worth Bateman told reporters.

He said the public subsidy money was divided evenly between alternative fuels project feasibility studies and agreements, in which the public will share the cost of project design and construction.

With the signing of the new synthels bill last week, the agency will loan another $6.5 billion in loans, loan guarantees and price supports to give industry incentives for alternative fuel projects, Bateman said.

Energy Secretary Charles Duncan said the awards are part of the administration's program to stimulate daily production of 500,000 barrels of synthetic fuels by 1987 and 2 million barrels by 1992.

The $6.5 billion synthels kitty seems to place the agency in competition with the fledgling Synthetic Fuels Corp., which is supposed to help finance the birth of a new domestic synthels industry with money earmarked under the $25 billion synthels bill.

Officials said Wednesday's awards, to be followed soon by proposal solicitations for another $300 million, will bridge the gap until the new public corporation can go to work.

But Assistant Energy Secretary Ruth Davis indicated the agency probably will keep tracking the projects it started, turning over to the new entity only the funds remaining unobligated in the coming year.

The projects the agency plans to subsidize will use coal, shale, tar sands, lignite, peat, biomass, solid waste and unconventional natural gas to make gaseous, liquid and solid fuels and chemical feedstocks.

Out of 971 proposals, the agency selected just 11 projects for cooperative agreements, which are limited to $25 million each, and 89 for feasibility studies, limited to $4 million.

Congress has since boosted the limits to $100 million and $10 million respectively.

Controversy in Alaska

ALASKA is a big state, equal to about one-fifth of the land area of the contiguous 48 states.

The struggle over disposition of public lands in Alaska is a big fight. Alaska's total land area is 365 million acres. The state of Alaska has 104 million, and Alaska native people were awarded 44 million. So there is 217 million remaining as public land owned by all the people of the 50 states.

Some of this is proposed to be included in national forests and in national parks and wildlife refuges. The balance, 135 million or more, is to remain under management of the Bureau of Land Management.

Alaska has thousands of miles of rivers, some with salmon runs. It has great wildlife resources, including large caribou herds. It also has mineral timber, oil and gas.

While the controversy has been loud, it shouldn't be exaggerated. Proposed management would pose no apparent conflict on millions of acres. Part of the issue is energy, and the energy potential of land that might be included in parks or wilderness areas.

The Department of Energy has indicated that 85 percent of the land in Alaska rated important or very important for potential energy development lies outside areas that could be closed to oil or gas development.

Much of the controversy centers around the coastal plain of the Arctic Wildlife Range. Wilderness designation would maintain the undisturbed habitat of the porcupine, bays, and porcupine caribou herd. The area is used by caribou during and after calving.

A U.S. Geological Survey report says, "In the affected area around Marsh Creek, the prospects for large oil or gas deposits on the rocks of the Ellesmerian sequence, including traps of the Prudhoe Bay type, are very low." Areas rated more promising for oil and gas are outside the land areas in issue.

Some of the rhetoric about Alaska would lead some to believe that energy development would be seriously curtailed if protection for wildlife supported by the Carter administration becomes law.

In fact, it appears that most of Alaska's energy potential can be made available, while protecting the huge caribou herds and other wildlife. Should some oil remain to be discovered in any area left of limits it would still be there for some future generation.

All Americans, including Idaho residents, have a stake in the future of the public lands in Alaska. This is part of our public land heritage.

The House has acted and the action will be in the Senate later this month. Lobbying has been intense on both sides. Energy interests and the state of Alaska are working to open more land to development. Wildlife interests are backing amendments to a Senate committee bill, hoping it will come out more like the House version.

Most of Alaska's land, and most of its resources, are going to be open to development, no matter what happens in the Senate. But decisions on particular areas will be warmly debated. You are likely to hear much about Alaska in the weeks ahead.

Carter's auto plan resembles swiss cheese

The aid package offered by President Carter to the ailing U.S. auto industry has about as many holes in it as a rusted-out, defunct Packard.

The presidential package obviously is a hurried, pressured proposal that carries too high a price tag and lets the car companies off the hook for their own mistakes.

Half of that $1 billion would come in relief from government-mandated auto emission and mileage requirements. While a reasonable relaxation of regulation could be in order, the plan should not be viewed as Detroit's salvation.

The fact is Japan and Germany are producing cars that not only have met mandated standards, but are ahead of the field. If the U.S. auto industry had spent as much time and money in competitive development as it did in fighting the environmental regulations, it might not be in the spot it is in today. Now, in the teeth of a recession, the industry is being pinched by its own lethargic impudence.

Carter's remedy is an election year political pork barrel. Pouring federal billions into Detroit is a popular diversion. Detroit's quandary is that it sits with outdated plants that produce too many uneconomical cars. To retool to meet the need for smaller, more efficient cars will take time and a great deal of capital. In the meantime, foreign competitors are gobbling up the domestic market like Godzilla unengaged.

Government can help with aid to help those cope with unemployment and for tax credits for capital investment. But getting into such programs as loan guarantees is another matter. Yes, Chrysler is being bailed out but those odds of success are no better than 50-50. Is Uncle Sam to come to the rescue of every industry that goes through economic spasms? What about the home building industry? Where is the line drawn?

There is some contention that clamping down on imported autos is more of what Detroit would really rather have — to limit the competition. But such trade protectionism is a facade, and we can ill afford to have the U.S. end up in a foreign trade war.

Carter's response has been hailed by automakers as a good "first step." More than likely it is the first reach into the political grab bag during this election year.

May take years to develop

Was it a watershed press ruling?

By JACK C. LANDAU
© Newhouse News Service

WASHINGTON — For the last decade, since the government's unsuccessful efforts to stop publication of the Pentagon Papers, there has been a great debate among the Supreme Court justices and among journalists over the extent to which the First Amendment protects the free expression of news and ideas.

All the justices, journalists and news media lawyers agreed to one principle: that the First Amendment stops the government from issuing orders prohibiting the news media from publishing information they have gathered.

Each time the court has had a case involving a direct prohibition on publication, it has struck down the prohibition.

But justices, lawyers and journalists have disagreed among themselves on whether the First Amendment goes even further and also imposes on the government some important limits on its access to government information.

Each time the court has had a case involving a direct prohibition on publication, it has struck down the prohibition.

But justices, lawyers and journalists have disagreed among themselves on whether the First Amendment goes even further and also imposes on the government some important limits on its access to government information.

Chief Justice Warren Burger, Justice Potter Stewart and others on and off the court have argued that the First Amendment is not a "Freedom of Information Act" and that it confers on the public no right to force the government to provide access to information.

But justices Lewis F. Powell, John Paul Stevens and others have argued that the unfettered right to publish information is, in many cases, a meaningless right if the public and the press are denied access to the information in the first place.

Therefore, they have argued, the First Amendment protection against stopping the presses must extend, in some instances, to guaranteeing the right to obtain the information to put on the presses. In 1976, newspapers argued the government's closely supervised nature of prisons, reporters should have a right to interview prisoners privately and observe prison conditions. In a 1976 case, the press argued it ought to at least have the right to inspect prison facilities.

In each case the Supreme Court, by a divided majority, refused to grant press access.

Burger wrote, "The First Amendment (does not) mandate a right of access to government information or sources of information within the government's control."

Now the Supreme Court appears to be reversing its majority view.

In its ruling this past week that trials must be public except in the most extreme circumstances, Burger wrote the majority opinion:

"The First Amendment . . . prohibits government from abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. These expressly guaranteed freedoms share a common core of assuring freedom of communication on matters relating to the functioning of government."

Burger said, "Plainly it would be difficult to single out any aspect of government of higher concern and importance to the people than . . . criminal trials."

"The First Amendment," he said, "goes beyond protection of the press and self-expression of individuals to impart to the people the stock of information from which members of the public may draw."

He concluded, "Without some protection for seeking out the news, freedom of the press could be eviscerated."

Stevens, who earlier had unsuccessfully argued for the right of the press to gather government information under the First Amendment, added an important opinion:

"This is a watershed case. Until today, the court has accorded virtually absolute protection to the dissemination of information or ideas, but never before has it squarely held that the acquisition of newsworthy matter is entitled to an absolute protection whatsoever."

Stevens said that he, Brennan and Powell long had been convinced that an official government policy of concealing some types of knowledge from the public, "by arbitrarily cutting off the flow of information at its source," was an abridgement of freedom of speech and the press.

But they had been unable to persuade a majority of the court, Stevens said. "Today, for the first time, the court unequivocally holds that an arbitrary interference with access to information is an abridgement of . . . the First Amendment."

It remains to be seen where this watershed case will lead.

Like many Supreme Court rulings, it may be only the seed of a new doctrine, and the justices may take years to more fully develop its scope.

Or, as has happened in the past, it may go nowhere when put to the test of practicality.

In any event — at least until the Supreme Court further clarifies the right of access — press groups, consumer organizations and other citizens group now will start citing this opinion in efforts to open the doors to government meetings and the drawers to government files.

Hope for new criminal code finally near after 14 years

By ED ROGERS
United Press International

WASHINGTON — Congressional leaders believe their 14-year-old dream of replacing the present jumble of overlapping, inconsistent and outdated federal criminal laws with an organized code is about to be fulfilled.

Hopes of enacting a new code this year — possibly even this month — were realized last week when the House Judiciary Committee approved a draft a subcommittee headed by Rep. Robert F. Drinan, D-Mass., had worked on since February 1979.

The committee expects to get a House vote in late July, about the time the Senate votes on a measure its Judiciary Committee approved last December.

To Drinan, the House bill culminates a five-year House career. A Jesuit priest, Drinan has yielded to a papal rule against clerics being in politics and will not seek re-election this fall.

One reason Drinan is optimistic over passage is that the administration has given it high priority. But the House and Senate bill have differences that must be reconciled.

"I dream the Senate will accept the House Bill," Drinan said. But if it does not, Drinan sees little difficulty. He said the bills are 85 percent alike.

Kenneth Feltberg, general counsel of the Senate committee, pointed out both bills closely follow recommendations of an American Law Institute's model code and of a congressional criminal code commission.

John Shattuck, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington Office, is dissatisfied with the House version, but believes the Senate bill has even worse features that might get adopted in House-Senate compromises.

Shattuck criticized the bill's inclusion of the 1799 Logan Act, which forbids citizen dealings with foreign governments, its provisions for mandatory jail terms for certain crimes, and its adoption of court standards for obscenity.

Drinan said political realities prevented inclusion of some provisions he wanted, such as one dealing with entrapment. Both the Senate and House committees left the law as it is on matters too controversial to agree on.

Drinan considers one of the House bill's greatest achievements is its provision for a federal sentence commission, and for guidelines to prevent the widely varying sentences different judges now impose for the same crime.

President Lyndon Johnson began the effort by proposing a criminal code commission, which Congress passed in 1966. Johnson appointed former California Gov. Edmund G. Brown Sr. as its chairman.

The Commission completed a code draft in 1971, and the Senate began work on bills that were regularly stalled in controversies over proposed changes in the law.

By 1971, Senate leaders decided they would have to skip controversial proposals if a new code was ever to pass. The House committee followed the same policy.

The chief purpose of the drafters was to put the array of criminal statutes in logical order so they can easily be found. The Senate committee still pointed to some of the problems in a report drafted earlier this year.

"Aircraft hijacking and espionage involving atomic weapons are now found hidden among obscure parts of regulatory provisions."

"Regulations, such as prohibiting use of the likeness of 'Smoking Bear,' are thrust in the middle of statutes involving murder, kidnapping and rape."

"There are gaps. It is now a federal crime to rob a bank but not to extort money from a bank."

The present federal law recognizes 70 different states of mind in which a crime may be committed. The House bill reduces the number to four.

The present law also includes outdated statutes, which enactment of a new code would wipe out. One such statute still makes it a crime to detain a U.S. government carrier pigeon.

Mike Royko

CHICAGO — I'm not sure what will come of it, but a lot of important people have suddenly taken an interest in Carlos Rodriguez, the carpenter whose South Side house was demolished after he had poured thousands of dollars and buckets of sweat into renovating it.

Presidential aide Jody Powell phoned from the White House to ask me if there was anything President Carter could do. Or "the boss," as Powell called him.

Powell said the White House might "nudge" Chicago area federal officials if that would help.

So the people at HUD, the agency that shares responsibility for the demolition, would be wise to expect a top-level nudge. If nothing else, the HUD bureaucrats should remain awake long enough to answer their phones.

Sen. Charles H. Percy and Rep.

Morgan F. Murphy have also assigned staff members to look into the case.

And Mayor Jane Byrne told Police Supt. Richard J. Brzezcek that she wanted the Chicago Police Department to investigate how and why the demolition occurred.

That means we have everybody from Chicago cops to a mayoral senator to the president of the United States poking around the rubble of Rodriguez's house.

All this official attention should mean that something will be done to establish the blame for the demolition and pay fair compensation to Rodriguez.

But don't be too sure.

Remember one of the agencies involved is a federal bureaucracy, which has already told Rodriguez that it is blameless, although it had authorized the city to demolish the home after it sold the house to Rodriguez.

Only a few weeks ago, HUD brushed off Rodriguez by telling him that if he wanted to be compensated, he'd have to go into court and sue the government of the United States.

And the other party in this farce is the City of Chicago, which may or may not have ordered the building torn down.

What the city certainly did was ignore Rodriguez for months. One such lawyer sent the city's legal department documents showing that a beautifully restored building had been demolished.

Then the city said it wasn't at fault that some mysterious force knocked the house down.

The city has even tried to place some of the blame on Rodriguez by saying that he didn't get building permits to do the restoration work. You bet he didn't. If he had applied for permits, he might still be waiting for them. If he didn't want to slip someone a bribe.

Now everybody wants to give Carlos Rodriguez a hand

So officials from HUD and the city have already gone on record saying that they were not at fault. And they might be able to prove it, too.

That's one of the great talents of the bureaucrats. They create a dizzying paper-work world of regulations, ordinances, rules, codes, forms and applications. And they expertly manipulate these elements so that they are always right, even when they are obviously wrong. And they are never wrong, even when they clearly are. It must have been a coin-flipping bureaucrat who was the first to say: "Heads I win; tails you lose."

Another thing to remember about the bureaucrats, especially those in the federal government, is that they aren't afraid of anyone. Not even presidents. Presidents come and go, but the bureaucrats are welded to their jobs. It would be hard to imagine one of them that to get him canned for blatant incompetence.

Carter knows that. At least now he does. In 1976, he campaigned by publicly promising to shrink the federal bureaucracy. Instead, he has watched it keep growing.

So while it might be reassuring, even flattering, to Rodriguez that the president is taking an interest in his humble case, I'm not sure what Carter can do. After considering his options, Carter might decide that his best bet is to come here and pray with Rodriguez for a miracle.

I'm also not sure what Sen. Percy and Rep. Murphy can do, although they seem to have their hearts in the right place by even offering to help.

After all, they are congressmen and the function of Congress is to pass laws. And it's all those laws that have created the federal bureaucracy in the first place. Every time Congress votes eyes on something up pops another federal office building and a swarm of bureaucrats. And up pop your taxes and blood pressure.

If they really want to help, they might consider introducing legislation that would provide public hangings for incompetent bureaucrats. After a couple of thousand hangings, the rest of them might shun up.

Or they might pass a law making it illegal for congressmen to pass more laws, under penalty of being detoured.

But I haven't lost hope in the Rodriguez case. I think it could be solved and those who are to blame exposed. And I am counting on the Chicago police to do the job.

Why the police and not the president, or congressman?

Because it is summer, and Chicago cops' tempers grow short when it is hot.

So all they have to do is go in there and do their job, as they like to do it — just beat the truth out of somebody.

Winds reaching 100 mph smashed through the Waterloo, Iowa, airport, Wednesday

Tornado reported in Idaho

100 mph winds rip Midwest

By United Press International
Thunderstorms struck the Midwest with 100-mph winds Wednesday, hurling a DC-9 jetliner into the air at a Waterloo, Iowa, airport, destroying scores of planes and causing damage estimated at up to $25 million.

Funnel clouds skipped over Idaho and powerful storms rolled from the Ohio Valley to the mid-Atlantic Seaboard. No injuries were reported.

Waterloo Municipal Airport looked like the target of an air raid. Runways were littered with debris and wrecked planes, piles of rubble stood where hangars once had been and the control tower was without a roof.

Winds clocked at more than 100 mph raked the airport early Wednesday. Officials reported up to 80 aircraft — including eight National Guard helicopters — damaged or destroyed and said damage could reach $25 million. No one was injured.

"One (plane) is blown right across the runway and is sitting out there on its ear," an airport spokeswoman said.

"An Ozark mechanic who was sitting in another plane, says the winds just lifted it up in the air — flying without turning on the motor," she said.

Mechanic Charles Ljowsky was alone aboard the Ozark DC-9 when the twin-engine jet made the unscheduled takeoff.

"All of a sudden the front end went up," he said. "All I could do was ride that baby until it came down. It was bad up there for a minute or so."

A damage survey was ordered but officials said it could take days to complete.

"Whatever, it will be a ferocious figure," the airport spokeswoman said.

Storm damage was confined mainly to the airport — located in a sparsely populated area north of Waterloo: Two hangars — capable of housing 32 planes — were demolished and a third was damaged. The control tower was unroofed and the terminal damaged.

Wind-driven debris damaged a few cars in the airport parking lot.

Rain and high winds hit Iowa, Wisconsin and Illinois.

Winds gusting to 70 mph accompanied heavy rains and felled power lines and caused scattered power outages in southern Wisconsin.

In northern Illinois, 75 mph winds denuded trees and toppled power lines, causing blackouts that affected some 25,000 people in the Chicago area.

Thunderstorms spawned two tornadoes in Idaho, but only one touched down. The twister swooped down in a residential area near Ririe, Idaho, hurling a wood-frame building housing a dance studio into some mobile homes and damaging a pickup truck. High winds shattered windows and downed power lines in the area but no injuries were reported.

Strong winds felled power lines and caused power blackouts in the Sandpoint area of northern Idaho. Some cars were damaged by wind-downed trees and a number of roads were blocked by fallen trees.

Lightning ripped a hole in the ceiling of the Greg Hobrock home outside Boise, Idaho.

Thunderstorms spread from the upper Ohio Valley to North Carolina and the Virginia Tuesday night and Wednesday, causing scattered power outages.

Strong winds picked up a mobile home and dropped it in the middle of a road near Harrisonville, Ohio, Tuesday night. No one was injured.

Thunderstorms dumped 2 inches of rain in less than an hour in some areas of Kentucky and West Virginia, triggering minor flooding.

Presidential debates set

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The League of Women Voters announced Wednesday its tentative schedule of presidential and vice-presidential debates for the fall campaign.

It said the presidential debates will be held in the weeks of Sept. 7, Sept. 21 and Oct. 26, and a vice-presidential confrontation is planned for the week of Oct. 5.

The league has as yet made no decision as to participants. Independent candidate John Anderson and several third-party candidates have asked to take part, but that issue still is being studied by an advisory committee.

Formal invitations to the candidates will be in the late summer after the August meeting of the league's Board of Directors, the announcement said.

Anderson makes ballot in Georgia

WASHINGTON (UPI) — John Anderson's campaign headquarters said Wednesday more than 80,000 signatures had been filed on petitions to get the independent presidential candidate's name on the November ballot in Georgia.

Georgia, with 12 electoral votes, requires 57,539 signatures. It is the 17th state in which Anderson supporters have met the requirements.

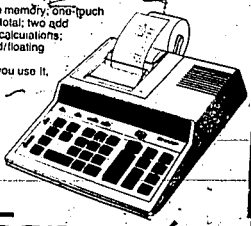

It also is President Carter's home state, and state petition drive coordinator Michael Marnell said the success showed "more than 80,000 of Jimmy Carter's fellow Georgians believe John Anderson deserves a place on the general election ballot."

He said the Georgia requirements were "one of the largest numbers of signatures in proportion to population and therefore a difficult task."

Carter wins another rules battle

WASHINGTON (UPI) — If there were any doubt the Carter people mean to control the Democratic party Rules Committee, it was erased Wednesday.

The Carter forces, which won their way easily Tuesday on a rule that would blind delegates to vote for the man they were elected to support, made sure Wednesday they didn't lose on anything.

After a standing vote showed they lost narrowly on a little-noticed matter relating to internal party affairs, they rallied their troops back onto the floor for a rollcall they won.

The issue at stake was whether members of the Democratic National Committee could also sit on the party's Judicial Council.

Reformers — many of them backers of Sen. Edward Kennedy — wanted such a possibility banned on the grounds it would be a conflict of interest similar to allowing a member of Congress to sit on the Supreme Court.

But Carter backers argued DNC members are best qualified for the council.

TURKEY LO MEIN

It was the classical Oriental banquet, with Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hu and guests delicately dining on pork steamed in lotus leaves at Peking's Great Hall of the People. Then Senate majority leader Robert C. Byrd arose and East met West, "Grand Ole Opry" style. Byrd — a mountain fiddler of note — drew his bow and sang along with the melody. Few of his hosts ever had heard "Turkey in the Straw." A few probably never had heard a fiddle. But they applauded anyway.

MERV'S MARKER

San Francisco attorney Vincent Hallinan says Elmer Griffin, who died in January, never paid him the $100,000 he owed him, so he's going after Griffin's nephew. He filed suit Tuesday in Redwood City, Calif., against Merv Griffin — says the TV talk show host was named executor of his uncle's estate and refused to make good on a 10-year-old promissory note. Hallinan isn't suing for damages — says "I just want the money that is owed me."

TAXI STALLED

Paramount Pictures Corp. says Judd Hirsch isn't hacking it this year, and that's a breach of contract, so they're suing him for $1 million. Hirsch, who gets $15,000 an episode to play Alex on ABC-TV's "Taxi," didn't show up to film the 1980-81 season. Paramount says in Los Angeles Superior Court that it has exclusive rights to Hirsch's talents. In addition to the $1 million, the film studio wants a court order barring him from going to work for anyone else.

SHIRTLEGGERS

Once upon a time, bootleggers smuggled booze. Now they smuggle T-shirts, and rock star Billy Joel wasn't it stopped. His attorney, Jules D. Zelon, is in court to bar the sale of counterfeit Billy Joel shirts by some 200 "litterant peddlers" he expects at Joel's July 11 concert in Hartford, Conn. He wants the contraband seized says only Rook Beer Bags, Ltd., which pays for the privilege, is authorized to hallow the Joel likeness on shirt fronts.

PETER FANNED

John Someborn makes his living in Hartford, Conn., by videotaping and selling old films that are in the public domain, and until he picked up the 20-year-old Mary Martin version of "Peter Pan," he never had any trouble. He does now. NBC-TV, which debuted, but never copyrighted, the show, is suing him. Says Someborn, "We're not trying to rip anybody off. This is a case of big business attacking the little guy. It's like Peter Pan trying to fight Captain Hook."

RESPECT AT LAST

Rodney Dangerfield may not be able to "get no respect," but he's at least got himself a record. The pop-eyed New York comic, who started his second career at 40, after giving up the first because he got married and thought show biz was "too crazy" for a family man, has his rapid-fire monologue on a Casablanca LP now. The title? "No Respect," naturally. And what changed his mind about show-biz? Says Rodney, "I learned it wasn't show business that was crazy. It was me."

Proxmire praises GSA for air fare deal

WASHINGTON (UPI) — Sen. William Proxmire, D-Wis., who for years has chastised federal agencies for wasting taxpayers' money, had kind words Wednesday for the much-criticized General Services Administration.

Instead of awarding his "Golden Fleece of the Month Award" to some hapless bureaucrat, Proxmire said he was giving the GSA an "Award of Merit."

The unexpected accolade came, the senator said, because of an effort by the GSA to reduce government's "skyrocketing air travel costs" by negotiating special discount rates for federal employees traveling on official business.

Proxmire said an experimental program launched by GSA could save about $7 million in the first six months if it is not "gouged" by the Civil Aeronautics Board.

"A merit award to the beleaguered GSA, which has historically been perhaps the most scandalized, least efficient and most politically hamstringed agency in the federal government, may amaze and astound government watchers," he said. "It's a man bites dog — irony of ironies — situation that these fiscal prima donnas should get an award."

But he added it was only "fair and just" the GSA get credit for negotiating 12 contracts under which official travel will cost between 55 percent and 69 percent of the standard air fare.

Proxmire noted a major airline and a travel agents' organization filed complaints with the CAB over the low government fares on routes between Washington and Los Angeles.

WASHINGTON (UPI) — Chinese officials and Republican presidential contender Ronald Reagan "with considerable apprehension and fear a swing in U.S. policy toward Taiwan," a Sino-Soviet expert said Wednesday.

Vladimir Petrov, Soviet-born pro-essor of international affairs at George Washington University, reviewed to a press forum his recent meetings with Chinese officials in Peking.

"The priority of China is maintenance of good relations with the United States at all costs," Petrov said.

He said the Chinese commented on American presidential politics: "Carter is a friend, Nixon is a friend. Kissinger is a friend. Reagan is an unknown."

Chinese concern also involves

Reagan's "commitment to Taiwan," Petrov said. "Any step back on Taiwan would cause friction. They view Reagan with considerable apprehension."

He said he was told that although China "cherishes" friendship with North Korea and sometimes publicly calls for removal of U.S. forces from South Korea, "we don't care if they are there for 25 years."

Chinese officials feel the immediate threat, he said, "is that the United States is in retreat" and Washington should do more in combating Vietnamese moves in Cambodia and on the Thai border and in bolstering Pakistan against the Soviet threat from Afghanistan.

"They feel we have been unfair to Pakistan," he said. Instead of offering them $400 million in military aid, "they should have got 10 times that amount."

Turkey

Ideological warfare between left and right keeps violence that alarms shaky government

© 1980 The Baltimore Sun

ANKARA—Across the office from a picture of a gray wolf, the banner of the Nationalist Action Party hung over his empty desk.

"His death was not unexpected," said Sadi Somuncuoglu, a former Cabinet minister and official of the ultra-rightist party, as if discussing a man with a terminal disease.

But Gun Sazak was gunned down outside his home a month ago, several weeks after asking police for protection. He was the most senior politician to die in a wave of violence that has claimed some 3,000 civilians over the last two years of ideological warfare in Turkey.

His death signaled that political leaders would no longer be immune from terrorism and set off fears of rightist reprisals. Rightist groups attacked offices and homes of members of the left-wing Republican People's Party and labor unions in provincial Turkey, defying martial law authorities.

Aparcan Turkes, the 63-year-old retired colonel who heads the Nationalist Action Party, blamed the RPP leader, Bulent Ecevit, personally for inciting the left to violence against Sazak, but urged restraint on his followers. The question was, which half of his speech would be listened to.

The NAP's Gray Wolves, leftist groups trained for combat with youth squads at Turkish universities, have been blamed for escalating the right-left armed confrontation, pushing it beyond the campus into broader public involvement.

Predictably, the left hit back with violent vigor and it is generally agreed that the Nationalist Action Party and its right-wing extremist admirers have suffered the majority of casualties over the last several years.

The sad but stoic acceptance of Sazak's death as "a continuation of longstanding tactics of the Communists and the left as Semucunoglu puts it, underlines the party's belief that the clashes will continue until a strong government finally takes power in Turkey.

Critics say the party would welcome the ultimate apocalyptic solution of the polarization of Turkish society—an authoritarian regime that would mercifully suppress the leftist infidel.

But Somuncuoglu stressed that a military government, such as Turkey has experienced twice since 1960, would simply exacerbate tensions and lead to success for anarchists and Communists in overthrowing the democratic system.

What is needed, he said, is an effective police force, insulated from political manipulation, that could use modern methods borrowed from Western Europe to track down killers and terrorists. That, of course, is what the left also proposes.

The rightist party official also deplored the authorities' refusal to give protection to threatened political leaders and to authorize the carrying of weapons. But there was no shortage of machine pistols to be seen in NAP headquarters as Sazak, a former minister of customs, was reportedly carrying a gun that he did not have time to use.

A proliferation of weapons has accompanied the elevation of ideological conflict, which some term an undeclared civil war. Last month, the Turkish parliament voted to allow parliamentarians, lawyers and journalists to carry the weapons, which will likely add to violent confrontations rather than reduce them.

The leftist terror groups are splintered and without much coordination. Eight militant have been killed in the last 18 months, but the overwhelming majority of killings has been localized clashes that have erupted for various reasons, generally tied to political differences.

The NAP, which ran a series of secret camps to train the Gray Wolves, is widely blamed for being the main terror element on the right, which it repeatedly denies.

But hundreds of its supporters are under arrest for murder, making bombs and plotting terror attacks. Party functionaries were involved in the bloody outbreak at Kahraman Maras in 1978, in which 111 persons died.

The party, largely the creation of Turkes, stands for extreme nationalism, suggestions of restoring Turkey's past grandeur in the Ottoman Empire region, and stern anti-communism.

The party tripled its votes in the 1977 elections and appears poised to do even better in the next election. It is one of the two parties that keeps the minority Justice Party government in office, having twice served in a coalition government with that conservative party and fully expecting to do so next time around. Its votes Wednesday when the government defeat a no-confidence motion.

Its appeals to nationalism and a desire for discipline have heightened, especially among poorer Turks, amid the violence, political upheavals and economic woes of Turkey in recent years.

The party tirelessly holds rallies every weekend throughout the country, not just around election time. (The only exceptions are in the 19 provinces where martial law rules prohibit political rallies.)

In May, more than 80,000 persons turned out for an NAP rally in central Anatolia, cheering speeches under flags of former Ottoman possessions and pictures of murdered party members, a tacit appeal for revenge.

"Our work is one of patience and perseverance, not of haste," says Turkes, for a long time his party's only deputy in parliament.

The party's spring to importance came Tuesday when the Justice Party leader, Suleyman Demirel, needed the votes of three smaller parties in order to fashion a parliamentary majority.

Demirel also found the right-wing, youthful Gray Wolves—named for a legendary beast that led ancient Turks out of starvation in central Asia to Asia Minor—a useful counter to the radical leftists' domination of the campuses.

Turkes vehemently denies that his party is fascist, noting that it served in two democratic governments and peacefully retired when the governments fell. But he is equally assertive that Ecevit is of Communist persuasion, a reflection of the polarization that plagues the Turkish political picture.

One of the key officers in the 1960 army junta that overthrew the regime of Adnan Menderes, Turkes has been jailed twice for "promoting" pan-Turkist nationalism and participating in an unsuccessful military coup.

After expulsion from the junta for allegedly advocating dictatorial government, Turkes sought his future in politics and became head of the party that is now called the Nationalist Action Party in 1969.

"Turkish nationalism and love for mankind are integral parts of our philosophy," according to a treatise written by Turkes.

The NAP youth organizations, Gray Wolves and "Idealist Circles," have been banned in West Germany as neo-fascist after violent skirmishes between leftists and rightist Turks in that country.

Here in Turkey, they continue to function openly. "They are simply youth development groups," Turkes is required to defend themselves from leftist extremists," Somuncuoglu explained.

World population growth rate slows

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The world population growth rate has slowed over the past decade, with Africa the only continent showing an increase, the Census Bureau reported Wednesday.

"Reinforcing a trend which first became evident in the mid-1970s, world population growth has been slowing over the past 10 years," the bureau said in its report, "International Population Dynamics 1950-79."

The report said 97 percent of the world's population lives in the 87 countries with a population of 25 million or more, comprising 4.28 billion of the world's estimated 4.4 billion people.

Of the six continents, only Africa showed a population growth rate that was rising rather than diminishing during the 1970-1979 period, the report said.

The world population grew 1.7 percent between 1976 and 1979, down from the 1.9 percent growth rate registered between 1970 and 1975.

Africa also showed a much higher birth rate than any of other continents. World birth and death rates were 27 to 29 births per 1,000 and 11 to 12 deaths per 1,000, compared to Africa's rates of 45 to 47 births per 1,000 and 16 to 18 deaths per 1,000.

Latin America registered 32 to 33 births per 1,000 and nine deaths per 1,000.

"Asia's birth rate approximated the world average, while those in the more developed regions of North America, Europe and the Soviet Union and Australia were at a level of about half the combined rate for the world as a whole," the report said.

The most populous countries, as reported by the Census Bureau, are China, 1 billion; India, 687 million; the Soviet Union, 263 million; and the United States, 220 million; and Indonesia, 145 million.

FLOPHOUSE

Q. What's the difference, if any, between a hotel and a flophouse?
A. Matter of rates, according to census official. If the place charges $4 or less a night, it's a flophouse.

Q. Old burlesque posters in the back of our theater show most all the girls to be quite plump. Was that the fact?
A. Evidently. Most ads for burlesque girls in those days stated that no one under 150 pounds need apply.

Q. Where'd we get the expression "beyond the pale" describe something unthinkable or not applicable or out of bounds?
A. From Ireland 400 years ago. A 20-mile area around Dublin was ruled by English law. It was called The Pale. Those beyond The Pale were neither controlled nor protected.

London subways collide

LONDON (UPI) — A crowded subway train barreled into the rear of another train at lunch hour in a station near the British Museum Wednesday, hurling some 250 passengers to the floor. No one was seriously hurt.

A fireman helping the passengers find their way through clouds of choking smoke and falling debris was slightly hurt. Other officials put the injured at "about 40." The exact toll was not known because many of the injuries were not serious enough to require hospital treatment.

The crash occurred at the Holborn underground station, the nearest subway stop to the British Museum and one of the deepest stations in the London subway system.

A Central Line train was halted at the platform with its doors open when a second train jammed with an estimated 500 passengers roared down the tunnel and crashed into the first train.

The engineer of the second train managed to jump clear of his cabin just before it was crumpled by the impact of the crash. Seven cars were damaged.

"There was a tremendous crash and clouds of choking smoke," one witness said. "There was black smoke and dust everywhere."

"When everyone flew forward," said Jay Sullivan, 17, a passenger on the moving train.

Everyone in both trains was hurled to the floor. Smoke filled the station.

"The train was crowded and people were standing," Sullivan said. "We all fell over. There was no panic, however."

"Right after the crash people shouted 'Keep calm,' said David Aitken, 33, who was in the stopped train. "There was no panic. People piled out in an orderly fashion. There was lots of black smoke."

Sullivan said he and other passengers broke windows and clambered from them onto the platform. Aitken said he and others dashed to help those from the moving train through the windows after the "tremendous crash."

Assistant Fire officer Ron Burrows said the moving train was "not going too fast," but its driver "had a miraculous escape."

Iran trial identifies hostage as spy

By United Press International
Victor L. Tomseth, one of the 53 American hostages, was named as a "notorious CIA spy" in the trial of an Iranian accused of being a double agent for the United States and the Savak secret police, a Tehran newspaper said Wednesday.

The Central Islamic Revolutionary Court also charged that the Iranian, Mohammed Ali Atigh, took part in "private meetings and drinking parties" thrown by former ambassador William H. Sullivan and his wife, and helped American officials burn documents at the time of the revolution. The court retired to consider a verdict, the Islamic Republic newspaper said.

Tomseth, 38, from Springfield, Ore., is one of three American diplomats who have been held in the foreign ministry in Tehran since militant Muslims seized the U.S. embassy 249 days ago.

He went to Iran in 1976 as consul in the provincial city of Shiraz and later moved to the Tehran embassy as a senior political officer. He is married with two children:

Christopher, 9, and Aranya, 2. Although Muslim militants have specifically accused some of the 50 hostages at the embassy of being spies, it was the first known denunciation by name of one of the three diplomats held separately.

Atigh worked at the Shiraz consulate and the newspaper called him "provincial adviser and translator of American spies in Iran."

It said he worked for the Americans for 13 years and provided information on consulate officials for the ex-shah's secret police for 11 years with the code name, "Daryoush."

The newspaper printed this exchange between the unnamed court president and Atigh:

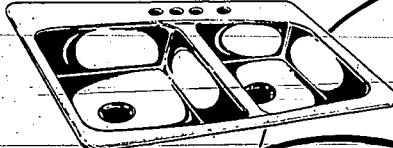

"Q: How many times did you meet Tomseth (the notorious CIA spy)?"
"A: Many times, he was our chief."
The account made no reference to Tomseth's activities as an alleged spy.
Charges said Atigh helped an American diplomat, named only as Scott, to burn "espionage documents" at the consulate. Atigh replied, "God knows I did not do it. Scott, the vice-consul, took the documents in bags and set fire to them and swore at me and other Iranian employees when we objected."

One of the charges against Atigh was "participation in the private meetings and night parties of the Americans and the American spies like (William H.) Sullivan, the U.S. ambassador to Iran during his years of service, together with his wife, and participating in drinking with them."

Crowd hails crippled Palestinian

NABLUS, Israeli-Occupied West Bank (UPI) — Crippled Mayor Bassam Shaka returned home in triumph Wednesday, welcomed by thousands of Palestinians who frenzied in their joy they slaughtered a sheep on the roof of his ambulance.

"They can take my legs but not my struggle," said the 47-year-old mayor, who returned from the Jordan where he underwent treatment after his legs were blown off in a bomb blast near his home last month.

Tense Israeli troops ringed the city of 30,000 as the cream-colored minibus ambulance rolled into streets festooned with red, green and yellow banners and signs in Arabic proclaiming Shaka to be "our hero," "our freedom fighter" and "our leader."

The crowd hoisted a terrified sheep on the roof of the ambulance and slaughtered it in a traditional Arab expression of joy. The blood ran down the windshield of the ambulance and young men reached for it as they wept for joy.

"They were so ecstatic that, as the blood streaked the ambulance, it crept through the pushing, shouting crowd towards the shaded courtyard of Shaka's hilltop home, the men grabbed the mayor and hoisted him upon their shoulders against his protests.

"Long live Bassam," the crowd shouted as one. "Palestine is Arab." Shaka, who has emerged as a major symbol of West Bank opposition to 13 years of Israeli occupation, spread wide his arms and stretched his fingers into the "V" for victory sign, smiling broadly.

The men carried him aloft into the house where he went up his room to rest. He planned to be back at his desk at city hall Saturday.

Israeli troops were there in case of trouble. But there were no incidents save for the people pushing and shouting and clanging at the doors and windows of the ambulance to get at Shaka in an emotional crescendo that nearly went out of control.

"If all of the Palestinians were killed except one woman, her children would carry on the struggle," he said.

Security forces have not found the assassins who carried out the attacks that maimed Shaka. Rashid Mayur Karim Khalaf, who lost his left foot in a similar car bomb explosion.

O Canada request boosts nationalism
OTTAWA (UPC) — Nationalism was given a boost Wednesday when Secretary of State Francis Fox promised to write television stations to ask them to play the national anthem O Canada before ending programming each day.

Liberal MP Normand Lapointe told the House several stations simply signed off. He asked Fox to "use his good offices" and write the stations asking them to play O Canada at the end of all programming.

Washington State University project leader Dr. Dale Croes issues instructions to a team of archaeologists preparing notes and mapping a grid inside an ancient Indian fishing shelter tucked in a cliff above the Hoko River on Washington's Olympic Peninsula

Archaeologists find shelter

SEKIU, Wash. (UPI) — An archaeological team has stumbled on an ancient Indian shelter—a natural cleft in a rock cliff—that may provide clues to the culture of prehistoric salmon fishermen.

The rock shelter, tucked in a cliff above the Hoko River on Washington's Olympic Peninsula, is believed to have been used by Indian fishermen as a home during the late fall fish runs.

It served that purpose for at least 1,000 years and perhaps as long as 3,000 years and was abandoned more than a century ago, for reasons unknown, said Dr. Dale Croes of Washington State University, head of the team that found the shelter.

"Rock shelters are rare along the Northwest coast," said Croes. "And ones that are almost completely undisturbed are rare anywhere in the world."

The discovery has solved a puzzle for Croes, who for four summers has led the excavation of a fishing settlement on the riverbank a few hundred yards from the well-hidden shelter.

Findings at the settlement proved Indians 2,500 years ago—believed to be ancestors of the present Makah tribe on the peninsula—developed a highly sophisticated hook-and-line fishery for halibut and other bottomfish.

But there was little evidence of salmon fishing. That was perplexing because the Hoko has an abundant run of chum salmon.

Now the team has found salmon bones and a hearth for cooking and processing fish in the shelter. The layers of debris are at least 14 feet deep. At a depth of six feet, the material has been dated as about 850 years old.

The shelter was discovered late last summer when an archaeology student climbed the cliff "to meditate or something" after dinner, Croes said.

The student thought he spotted an Indian carving on the rock.

Breakthrough at Johns Hopkins

New risk-free method of detecting lung cancer reported

© 1980 Chicago Sun-Times

BALTIMORE—A new, risk-free method of detecting lung cancers at an early stage, when they are most readily treatable, has been developed at the Johns Hopkins Medical Institutions here.

The method uses diagnostic medicine's newest tool, computerized tomography, to distinguish lethal cancers from harmless scar tissues and benign tumors without the danger, discomfort and high cost of exploratory surgery. The technique was described Tuesday by the radiologist who headed a team that developed it.

Dr. Stanley S. Siegelman said the method can identify non-cancerous shadows on an X-ray plate with 100 percent accuracy and can pinpoint actual cancers 89 percent of the time. Since more than half of all suspicious shadows turn out to be harmless, a majority of patients could get a clean bill of health on the basis of a quick and painless session under a "CAT scanner" (a sophisticated scanning procedure that displays cross-section X-rays).

The new technique costs about $130 compared with $4,000 to $5,000 for an exploratory operation known as a thoracotomy. Applied nationally, it could potentially result in medical-care savings of up to $150 million a year and could save 300 or more lives now lost in exploratory surgery.

A scientific paper reporting on experience with 88 patients in the last two years was published Tuesday in the American Journal of Roentgenology. It explained the theory on which the new diagnostic method is based.

Non-cancerous lesions of the lung, such as old scars from tuberculosis, are usually more dense than cancers, the reason being that scar tissue contains calcium and cancerous tissue does not.

But while this has been known for some time, there was no objective way to tell whether a doubtful lesion was malignant or benign except to get a sample from within the lung and examine it microscopically.

This is where the CAT scanner comes in. An X-ray of the suspicious lesion is subjected to computer analysis, and a set of numbers is produced. These numbers define the density of the lesion, relatively high numbers indicating non-cancerous tissue and relatively low ones cancerous tissue.

Siegelman's group has now proved that spots identified as benign by the scanner are indeed benign. In these areas, the only follow-up is periodic X-rays taken to make sure that the once-suspected lesion has not grown or otherwise changed. For spots identified as malignant, an exploratory operation is still required.

Siegelman's boss, chief radiologist Martin Donner, hailed the new technique as "a real breakthrough" that opens a whole new field of use for the controversial CAT scanner.

To date, the machines have been used mostly for the diagnosis of head injuries.

There is no question of the CAT scanner's cost-effectiveness in the diagnosis of lung cancer, Siegelman said. It is by far the cheapest of the four existing ways to distinguish benign and malignant lesions, and the only one that is entirely free of discomfort or risk.

Of the three other techniques, the simplest is bronchoscopy, in which an instrument is threaded through the nose and windpipe into the lung and a sniplet of tissue taken. This is possible only when the suspicious spot is readily reachable with this instrument.

Falling this method, doctors can sometimes do a needle biopsy, in which a small probe is inserted through the wall of the chest, and a sample snipped off. This, too, can be done only if the lesion is conveniently located close to the chest wall. A collapsed lung is "an adverse side-effect in about 20 percent of cases," Siegelman said.

About 50,000 people a year now have to undergo thoracotomy, in which the chest wall is opened up to give access to an otherwise unreachable lesion. This is a major operation in itself, involving seven to 10 days in the hospital.

Tips for making an impression

Be ready at job interviews

NEW YORK (UPI) — Job interviews can be difficult even for veteran job hunters, but for college graduates entering the permanent workforce for the first time, the experience often is confusing.

"After several interviews, every job sounds the same," said Bill Cantor, head of Cantor Concerns executive recruiters.

Cantor said college graduates can take several steps before and during the interview that will help make that important first job the right choice for his chosen career.

Before the interview the job hunter should familiarize himself with the firm, including its product line, sales and profit figures, and its place in industry. He or she should try to talk to an alumni of the same school who works for the company.

During the interview, Cantor suggests several questions the job seeker can ask the interviewer that will make a good impression and will help him decide if the firm is for him;

- How many new products has your company introduced in the past five years? This will give an indication of the firm's growth.
- What is the potential for advancement? How often will I be evaluated to know how well I'm performing my job?
- Who are the chief competitors? What are major markets? What percentage of sales is spent for research?
- What is the company's policy in an economic slump on salary increases and transfers? If one division hits a slowdown, does the employee have a chance to transfer to another division?
- Ask the interviewer how long he has been in his present position. His answers can be revealing about the company.

Tragedy strikes pope's visit as 3 trampled

Pope John Paul II watches a group of folk dancers perform for him at Fortaleza Stadium. A few hours earlier 3 persons were trampled to death in a rush to get into the stadium.

FORTALEZA, Brazil (UPI) — Thousands of people chanting "We want to see the pope" rushed the entrance of a soccer stadium to hear the pontiff celebrate mass Wednesday, trampling to death at least three women, including one 74 years old.

Accounts of the tragedy, which occurred before Pope John Paul II's arrival in Fortaleza, conflicted. Government information officials said "six or seven" persons died but the local morgue insisted that the death toll was three, with several dozen persons injured.

A Vatican spokesman said the pope "was informed of the deaths as soon as he stepped off the plane" that brought him to Fortaleza from Belem on the 10th day of his epic 12-day journey through Brazil. Gen. Assis Zezerra, chief of security for Ceara state, said the stampede occurred as the surging crowd which had gathered outside the stadium all night rushed the main gate, smashing it down. People in front were knocked down and those who could not get up were trampled underfoot, Bezerra said.

"The three women were victims of a trampling and they died in the entryway," he said. Vatican officials gave a slightly different version of events. They said they were told that the stampede started when officials decided to close the gates of the stadium, which already was jammed with more than 140,000 persons. Thousands more outside rushed the closing gates in their panic to get in, trampling the women underfoot.

The tragedy recalled a similar incident last month, when nine persons were trampled to death in Zaire during the pope's visit to Africa.

Pope learns of the tragedy

Seven hours later, John Paul began the mass in Castelao Stadium, cheered by the joyous crowd that sang and danced and appeared to be unaware of the tragedy which occurred earlier.

Carter honors Ohira; plans Hua talks

TOKYO (UPI) — President Carter eulogized Japan's late prime minister Wednesday, met his designated successor and prepared for his first formal meeting with the premier of China during a 20-hour visit to cement an old friendship and a new alliance. Carter and Chinese Premier Hua Guofeng led the dignitaries who attended a solemn memorial service for Prime Minister Masayoshi Ohira, a staunch ally of the United States and engineer of Japan's 1972 restoration of relations with China. Ohira died June 12 of a heart attack. Carter joined 240 other foreign guests in placing white carnations in front of a 15-foot-high memorial altar, on which rested an urn with Ohira's ashes. Above hung a massive portrait of the late prime minister. Carter's first encounter with Hua came at an evening reception for Foreign delegates to the Ohira memorial. The two leaders scheduled an evening meeting for Thursday morning, just before Carter's flight back to the United States. It will be the first talks between the two leaders since the United States

Toyota, Ford set joint venture

As President Carter attending memorial services for the late Japanese Prime Minister Ohira, Toyota, the nation's No. 1 car maker, confirmed talks were under way with Ford Motor Co. to establish a joint company to make small cars in the United States. U.S. auto makers and workers have demanded that Japanese car manufacturers cut back on exports to America and make cars there. Ministry of International Trade and Industry sources said Toyota's talks with Ford had only just begun and a final accord might not be reached until the end of the year.

As expected, President Carter did not raise the issue of massive Japanese automobile exports to America during his visit, although at a stop in Detroit just before his flight to Tokyo he had unveiled a new plan to help U.S. auto makers. That plan included a commitment to seek a quick ruling on Japanese car imports with the International Trade Commission.

and China normalized relations January 1, 1979. But Secretary of State Edmund Muskie told reporters the meeting would be largely "symbolic" since "you can't discuss very much in one hour."

The Soviet Union, which has warned against any U.S.-Chinese-Japanese alliance against Moscow, was represented at the memorial services only by its ambassador to Japan, Dmitri Polyanski.

Muskie said he did not think the Soviets were "particularly worried" about the Carter-Hua meeting, adding the two "might exchange impressions about possible future developments in our relations."

National Security Advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski, who with Muskie accompanied Carter to Japan, said the president and Hua also would discuss the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the Vietnamese occupation of Cambodia and his incursions into Thailand. Carter flew into Japan less than two hours before the memorial service and stood bare-headed in a driving rain to eulogize Ohira as a "good friend and wise counselor." Then, dressed in a formal cutaway and striped trousers, Carter and 8,000 others sat in the Budokan, a vast octagonal sports arena on the grounds of the Imperial Palace, and listened to a tape of Ohira's remarks during his last visit to Washington in May, just over a month before his death. At the time, Ohira had pledged support for U.S. initiatives in dealing with the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the Iran's seizure of the 53 American hostages. "Freedom, democracy, justice and peace with us so dearly shared among us can be seriously harmed for long years to come if we now fail to stand together," Ohira said.

President Carter paid a courtesy call on Japanese Emperor Hirohito during his state visit to Japan this week.

During tour of Israel

Anderson denounces arms sale

JERUSALEM (UPI) — John Anderson said Wednesday any decision on U.S. weapons sales to Saudi Arabia and Jordan should depend on whether the two countries are willing to join the Middle East peace process. The Independent American presidential candidate made the remarks after meeting with Israeli Foreign Minister Yitzhak Shamir to discuss, among other things, projected sales of U.S. tanks to Jordan and requested upgrading of combat jets for Saudi Arabia. "The sale of arms to Saudi Arabia if we engage in the unrestricted sale of arms to Arab countries without getting some concession from them that indicates that they are interested in working out an overall settlement of the problem in the Middle East," Anderson said. Earlier, a minor automobile accident touched off a flurry of excitement among the Israeli security agents traveling with the candidate. No one was hurt when an Israeli motorist bumped his car into the front of an auto carrying Anderson through Jerusalem after a meeting with President Yitzhak Navon. The guards were quickly reassured that the incident was not a prelude to an attack on Anderson, and the candidate changed cars and continued on his way to see Labor Party leader Shimon Peres. The Jerusalem Post, meanwhile, quoting "informed U.S. officials," reported that a proposed Anderson visit to Jordan was cancelled due to a snub by King Hussein. The cancellation was announced Tuesday by Anderson's aides, who gave no reason for it. The candidate himself refused to comment on the Post report, which said Hussein was angered by Anderson's refusal to differentiate between Arab East and Jewish West Jerusalem. The United States does not recognize Israel's claim to East Jerusalem, and Hussein was reportedly angry over Anderson's departure from U.S. policy on the sensitive issue.

Royal family denies rumor of marriage

LONDON (UPI) — Buckingham Palace ended the latest tempest in Britain's teatime Wednesday by denying that Prince Charles has any intention of marrying the Roman Catholic princess of Luxembourg, Marie-Astrid. The wedding rumors revived controversy over an old law preventing Charles, 31, from marrying a Roman Catholic. Militant Protestants afraid that the rumors were true had demanded that Charles be barred from the throne if the love of his life turned out to be Catholic. "There are no plans whatsoever for Prince Charles to marry Princess Marie-Astrid," the palace spokesman said. "We have never been," said palace spokesman Michael Shea, noting the two barely knew each other and had not met in recent years. "Any statement to the contrary is totally without foundation," he added for good measure, "totally ridiculous and inopportune." The Act of Settlement of 1701 requires members of the immediate royal family to be Protestants. Queen Elizabeth is said to speak highly of the daughter of her old friends, the Grand Duke and Duchess of Luxembourg. But controversy over the law was revived when militant Scottish and Northern Irish Protestants demanded it not be changed to allow Charles to succeed Elizabeth. He would marry outside the Protestant faith. Four members of Parliament — a Presbyterian, Roman Catholic, Jew and agnostic — introduced a bill for debate July 29 to amend the Act and allow Charles to marry Marie-Astrid, one of the few unmarried princesses in Europe, the future Queen of England.

Hostage families want more 'subtle pressure' on Iran

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The wives of two Tehran hostages sent a letter to Republican and Democratic national convention officials Wednesday, saying it is crucial to keep "subtle pressures" on Iran to release the 33 American captives.

"The American hostages in Iran are not forgotten by the American people despite the fact that publicity concerning them has lessened since April," said Paine Laingen, wife of U.S. charge d'affaires Bruce Laingen, and Mrs. Richard Moorefield, whose husband also is a hostage.

Both women live in the Washington area.

"Bullying Iran seems to harden the fundamentalists' further; nevertheless it seems important to keep subtle pressures upon Iran, isolating her as an Islamic disgrace and economic disaster, until she realizes holding hostages is counter-productive," they said in letters to Sen. John Tower, who is chairing GOP platform proceedings, and to Democratic Chairman John White.

"The United States owes no apology to Iran," they added. "Congressional investigations into alleged 'host crimes' of the United States in Iran are irrelevant to the hostage issue and should not be undertaken," they said, and if any are held it should only be after the hostages have returned.

"Whatever sympathy or understanding we might have for Iran rapidly diminishes each day the hostages continue to be held," the women said.

Yet, they said, once the hostages are released, the United States should respect Iran's desire to be non-aligned.

"However, we must in no way suggest that the United States will bilibely forget the grievous acts perpetrated against our fellow-Americans," the women said. "To do that would be prejudicial to the concept of diplomatic immunity and harmful for the future, demeaning to the hostage and intolerable to the American people who have shown patience and maturity in this crisis."

Hansen says West logical nuke storehouse

By STEVE LIPSON
Times-News writer

SUN VALLEY — The West is the logical place to store nuclear wastes, according to former Idaho Congressman Orval Hansen.

Speaking during the first full day of the Conference of Western Attorneys General in Sun Valley Wednesday, Hansen said the number of nuclear power plants in the country will double during the next decade. The radioactive wastes from those plants will almost certainly be stored in the western states, he said.

The challenge for state officials in the West is to work with the federal government to provide safe storage for the wastes, he said.

Attorneys general and their aides from 10 western states are attending the Sun Valley conference. The main topics of the meeting are the "Sagebrush Rebellion" and nuclear waste disposal.

Wednesday afternoon the attorneys flew to the Idaho National Engineering Laboratory for a tour of the nuclear research and test facilities there.

During the morning session, Hansen, who now practices law in Washington, D.C., said he believes storage of nuclear wastes is the safest aspect of nuclear power. The safety record of existing nuclear power plants is remarkable, he said. However, "using technology now remarkable or in sight" the disposal of radioactive wastes presents even less danger, he said.

The biggest obstacles to safe disposal of nuclear wastes are political, not technical, Hansen said.

Sheldon Meyers, assistant secretary for nuclear waste management for the U.S. Department of Energy, said the department's attitude about possible sites for nuclear waste disposal facilities is: "If you don't want us there, we won't be there."

The DOE will not put a waste disposal facility in a state if elected officials from the state oppose it, he said. But there are nuclear wastes to be disposed of. They can't be left in temporary storage forever, he said.

The federal government probably has legal authority to put a waste disposal facility in any state it wishes, Meyers said. But the DOE needs cooperation from the states, he said.

If a state didn't want a waste disposal facility, the state could make it impossible for the government to operate one, he said. The government doesn't want to find itself in a position where it has to send in the Army because state police are stopping trucks with radioactive wastes from entering a state, he said.

"The Department of Energy recognizes it will have no place to site waste disposal facilities if it doesn't work with state and local officials," Meyers said.

"We want to work with the states. The question is how," Meyers said.

The president recently formed a State Planning Council, made up of state officials and representatives from federal agencies. The council is still getting itself organized, Meyers said, but it may provide answers to that question.

While Meyers said the federal government wants to increase cooperation with the western states, the past record of cooperation on energy issues is dismal, according to several western attorneys general.

John Troughton, Wyoming attorney general, said he has received a "remarkable education" since becoming attorney general. The federal government is a "destructive" and "counterproductive force" in the state's development of its energy resources, he said.

Harry Swainston, deputy attorney general for natural resources in Nevada, said he doesn't view the present federal approach to energy development on federal land with "optimism."

All the attorneys general expressed concern over the future of the West's water. All energy production requires water, they said, but they fear the federal government may establish dangerous legal precedents in water law through its involvement in energy development.

Time ran out at the morning session before Idaho Attorney General David Leroy could give his report on energy development and the federal government in Idaho. He will give the report later in the conference, which concludes Friday.

Local immunization rates fall below minimal federal levels

By LARRY SWISHER
Times-News writer

TWIN FALLS — This fall, the Idaho school immunization program enters its third year with the threat of epidemics still not eliminated.

Statewide and in many areas, including Twin Falls, rates are below the 90 percent considered safe.

"A lot of parents are thumbing their noses at the law," said Bob Medlin, state immunization coordinator.

"Personally I think it's inescapable, since it was mandated by the Legislature and there are exemptions."

Medlin and Dr. Fritz Dixon, head of the Bureau of Preventive Medicine, were in Twin Falls Wednesday for an informational and awards meeting between south central Idaho health workers and school officials.

The immunization in this year will require parents of children in kindergarten through fifth grade to provide or have provided schools with records of their children's immunizations. They have 60 days from the time they enter a child in school to comply.

This past school year, when the law applied to kindergarten through third grades, 86 percent of parents in the state provided records. Two percent sought exemptions, which are granted on the basis of religious or personal objections. And the rest did not respond at all.

South central Idaho as a whole compares to the state average, but in Twin Falls County, a mere 77 percent provided records. South Central District Health Department Director Gerald Huret said 90 percent immunizations "just about wipes out any threat of epidemic."

"The Twin Falls area has done just as well if not better than most of the state," Medlin said. But there are a lot of unprotected children.

"No one should rest easy," he said, "because these children may be in danger of catching a disease and being handicapped for life."

The state does not assume that all children of parents who do not comply with the law are not immunized, Medlin said. But research finds they are generally more poorly immunized than the rest.

Medlin said non-complying parents may either lack their children's immunization records or have not kept them up. They should contact their family physician or clinic and request a copy of those records. A parent who has a question should consult a physician or the health district.

Parents have notoriously not kept records, Medlin said, and one step that may help them now on is the recent adoption in Idaho of a single, official, parent-maintained immunization form.

Another step being taken to better the response rate is the revision in this year of the Statewide Immunization Task Force, a volunteer program headed by Lola Evans, wife of Idaho Gov. John Evans.

Clara Katz of Twin Falls is the volunteer coordinator for south central Idaho.

Cedar Creek Dam, also known locally as Roseworth Reservoir Dam, is considered an "unsafe" dam, according to federal guidelines

Dam safety

One dam in Twin Falls County unsafe, though officials say there's no danger

By States News Service
WASHINGTON — At least one of three dams being inspected by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in Twin Falls County is considered "unsafe," but officials say area residents are in no danger.

The Cedar Creek Dam, on Cedar Creek about 23 miles south of Buhl, meets neither state nor federal guidelines for dam safety. Because its spillway — where water pours through the dam — is not large enough, a large rainfall could cause the dam to collapse.

That is not considered likely to occur soon. If it did, however, the resulting flood would cause considerable erosion in the canyon through which the creek flows and would leave a lot of debris. Some resort and park areas would be affected, but there would be little damage to private homes and farmland, said David Hollingshead, head of the dam safety section of the Idaho Water Resources Department.

The army corps has been working since 1977 on a $100 million dam inspection project. So far about 5,000 dams have been inspected nationwide. About 25 percent found unsafe. The total number of inspections is expected to rise to about 9,000 by the end of next year.

In Idaho 25 dam inspections had been completed as of a few days ago. Sixteen dams, or 64 percent, were found to be unsafe. Most are used for irrigation, as is the Cedar Creek Dam, owned by Cedar Mesa Reservoir and Canal Company.

The corps of engineers, working along with state officials, have found no major problems at dams on the Snake River whose failure might have a large impact on the Twin Falls area.

The corps recommended only minor maintenance improvements at the Milner Dam, about 12 miles east of Burley, the closest dam upstream from Twin Falls. The dam, owned by Twin Falls Canal Company, is not listed as unsafe.

The Mindokla Dam and the American Falls Dam, further upstream, have not been inspected under the army corps program. The Mindokla Dam is due for inspection, while the larger American Falls Dam, reconstructed last year, will not be inspected by the corps, said Hollingshead.

Hollingshead, the state dam official, said the federal inspection project "has been a real complement to our ongoing state effort."

But he, as well as officials in other states, feel the federal dam safety standard is not only too high, but meaningless because it is vague.

While Idaho requires dams to be able to withstand the biggest flood that can be expected in a 100-year period, the federal guidelines require them to withstand the "probable maximum flood," which would result from the most severe combination of critical conditions that could be reasonably expected," said army corps public affairs officer Edward Greene.

Hollingshead said the state has told the Cedar Creek Dam owners to enlarge its spillway. No timetable on repairs has yet been set up, he said.

Two other minor dams in Twin Falls County have also been inspected. The corps recommended further investigations at the Salmon Falls Dam, owned by Salmon River Canal Company and located about 22 miles south of Cassford. The dam was not called unsafe, but deteriorating concrete was found, said Normal Wilke of the Army Corps of Engineers office in Walla Walla, Wash.

No report has yet been issued on the Murtaugh Dam, located about 15 miles southeast of Twin Falls.

Two dams in Cassia County do not meet federal standards but are within the more lenient state ones. They are the Sublett Dam, located about 22 miles east of Malta and owned by Sublett Irrigation Company, and the Oakley Dam, owned by Oakley Canal Company and located a few miles south of Oakley.

Health district seeks $6,000 budget hike

TWIN FALLS — An increase of $6,038 in the 1980-81 budget for the South Central Idaho Health District was requested of Twin Falls County Commissioners Wednesday.

Commissioner Chairman Merl E. Leonard said several members of the district health board met with commissioners Wednesday, explaining very little increase in health costs is anticipated this year and the district is holding down costs to every possible extent.

Leonard said the Twin Falls County share of local funding for the eight-county district would increase from $150,512 for the current budget year to $156,550, if the request is approved. Each of the eight counties pays for the health district services through a tax levy based on population and assessed valuation. The state provides the remainder for the district operation.

Leonard said the county is having difficulty meeting all funding needs, but — providing the 4 percent increase in income is granted — the county may be able to come up with the $6,038.

"At this point we aren't even sure of that. We have a different assessed value figure this year due to the change in the law and we aren't sure what our total available budget revenue will be."

On about 80 percent of total market value on all property, Twin Falls County's valuation has surpassed the $1 billion mark, Leonard said, compared to about $866 million for the previous year. However, he added, the law prohibits increasing tax revenue so the increased valuation figure doesn't help that much in new income.

New energy director says it is time office proves itself

By DAVID MORRISSEY
Times-News writer

TWIN FALLS — The new director of the Idaho Office of Energy said Wednesday it is time for the office to prove its worth.

Ken Green, who was appointed director of the office last month, said that proof was forthcoming by the gathering of the next Legislature in January.

"If the Office of Energy doesn't produce a product for the citizens of Idaho, if you don't prove your value to the state, you're not deserving to exist," Green said.

Green, in Twin Falls for a meeting of "Energy for Idaho," a coalition of citizens, organizations and industries concerned with assuring Idaho's energy supply, said the next six months would be a vital period for the office. Not only must the agency dispell existing ill will, it must convince Idahoans it is worthy of staying in existence.

Legislators have cut state funding for the office to a bare bones budget because legislators perceive the office as one more unnecessary bureaucratic agency.

Green, a 35-year-old administrator who previously coordinated Idaho Enforcement Assistance Administration grants in Idaho, believes that by the beginning of next year, the agency can present a budget to the Legislature and defend its request for state funding.

Some of the criticism of the energy office has been legitimate, Green said.

One major problem has been that the office has had an excellent staff but that the staff has been given little guidance from its directors. Green also criticized former acting director Lenaghan for creating unnecessary friction between utilities and the office.

Utilities and the Energy Office should be working together to conserve existing energy and create new energy, rather than fighting each other, Green said.

But some criticism has resulted from the office failing to inform the public of what it has done and can do, Green said.

When created during the energy crisis in 1974, the office was charged with allocating limited supplies of fuel within the state, Green said. It was later also charged with enacting the Idaho Energy Conservation Plan, drafted in 1977, which had the goal of reducing the state's energy consumption by 5 percent by 1980.

Green said the office has satisfactorily responded to both of those tasks.

The fuel allocation program is specifically funded by the Legislature, Green said, calling that one indication that the program is working. The fuel allocation effort has also helped direct Idaho's limited fuel resources to needed users, he said.

Green also said conservation efforts directed by the office, plus a program of retrofitting schools, public buildings and homes will allow the state to meet its goal of saving 5 percent of the state's energy this year.

"Energy we save is just as good as new energy produced," he said.

Green said the office has had one of its biggest failures in simply "getting the word out" about what it does.

MVMH board follows maxim of getting money's worth

By STEPHANIE SCHOROW

TWIN FALLS — If you get what you pay for, then the Magic Valley Memorial Hospital Board has decided quality is worth the price.

The board's decision to Tuesday night's decision to retain the Travis Martin firm of Canon City, Colo., to provide physicians for the hospital's emergency room.

The board's decision was based on the firm's proposal to pay for the firm's firm will probably cost $30,000 more over the next three years than the lowest bidder, board members were apparently swayed by the overwhelming support for the firm by the hospital staff.

Tuesday's special board meeting was attended by doctors, nurses and other staff who testified to the excellent work of Dr. Kent Premaux, Dr. Philip Nelson and other emergency rooms, "the best thing you hear are the exception, not the rule," Dr. Gary Gingrich told the board.

Dr. Will Chamberlain noted the emergency room doctor represents "the hospital" to those who come to the hospital in emergencies. He said quality care, as well as lower rates, should be a factor in serving the public.

The three doctors who live in Ketchum, rotate — a super-vision of the emergency room so at least one doctor is at the hospital for emergencies 24 hours a day, seven days a week. Rather than hiring doctors outright for the emergency room or depending on area physicians to come on call, MVMH employs a service provider firm, which in turn employs the doctors and provides malpractice insurance.

The three doctors have worked three years at MVMH, previously under another contractor. Their six-month contract expires Aug. 1.

The final vote was 10 to 1 to award Martin's three-year contract. Board member Don Sharp, who earlier expressed concern the higher cost of the contract would spark higher rates, cast the sole dissenting vote. Sharp also felt quality provided by the low bidder, Spectrum Emergency Care, one of the nation's large emergency care firms, would be high.

MVMH controller Scott Richardson told the Times-News the higher cost of Martin's contract would not affect hospital rates, which are scheduled to be evaluated for possible hikes in 1977, regardless of the emergency room decision.

But if Martin's contract had been

PHILADELPHIA (UPI) — Philadelphia Phillies President Ruly Carpenter Wednesday said published reports of an investigation into the possibility that his players were being prescribed amphetamines was a shock but reminded that "no one has been charged with anything."

Speaking at a news conference, Carpenter commented on a report in Tuesday's Trenton (N.J.) Times that said eight Phillies players will be interviewed by the Pennsylvania Drug Law Enforcement Office to determine if they illegally obtained amphetamines.

In a statement, Carpenter said, "No one has been charged with anything, no one has been accused, no one has broken any laws. It's all speculative."

Carpenter said team doctors have cautioned players about the use of drugs and that trainers do not issue drugs without a doctor's prescription.

The Times report named eight players, including National League All-Stars Pete Rose and Mike Schmidt.

Later, Carpenter said that he was asked by agents of the Drug Law Enforcement Office not to discuss the information any further and that the players named in the reports would have no comment.

The Reading Times, in a copyright story Wednesday, quoted a local pharmacist as saying Dr. Patrick Mazza, a physician for the Phillies' minor league affiliate in Reading, as prescribing the amphetamine Desoxyn to Phillies players. Mazza emphatically denied the report.

Carpenter said he was first made aware on Monday of the Trenton report written by J. Stryker Meyer, the day before it hit the newstands.

"He related to me the story as it appeared," Carpenter said. "I have no control over what he wrote, but I told him that to make allegations of this kind, you have to have all the facts."

Commenting on another report that the Berks County district attorney's office in Reading said neither Schmidt nor Larry Bowa are involved in the investigation, Carpenter said, "Two for four is a good batting average in baseball but in newspaper work, it's not good."

Carpenter initially said the report was not shocking because "nothing surprises me any more," but added later that he was surprised.

"It was quite a shock," he said. "It's unfortunate that professional athletes were involved with all the publicity. Under other circumstances, if a writer came across these facts, they wouldn't be published, but they were since they're professional athletes."

The Phillies president added that baseball commissioner Bowie Kuhn "will be looking into the matter."

The Trenton report named Greg Luzinski in addition to Rose, Schmidt and Mazza. The Reading Times, a pharmacist, who asked to remain unidentified, as saying Desoxyn was prescribed to Luzinski, Bowa, Steve Carlton, Randy Lerch, and Larry

All-stars Pete Rose and Mike Schmidt, shown here before Tuesday night's all-star game, will have investigators waiting for them when they return to Philadelphia. Those two along with several teammates are being questioned as to whether they had obtained amphetamines illegally. The pills reportedly were obtained through a prescription from the team physician to a Trenton, N.J., druggist. Phillie owner Ruly Carpenter cautioned against flying to conclusions, noting no one had been charged with anything yet.

Christenson.

Mazza, who Carpenter said was not on the payroll of the Reading team, said he has only prescribed Desoxyn to a few patients for weight loss and did not recall ever prescribing the drug to baseball players.

The pharmacist, quoted in the Reading report said prescriptions were written in Mazza's handwriting and that the doctor believed that everything "was above board."

The Trenton newspaper report quoted sources as saying the drugs were supplied through a runner—the contact who turned over the drugs to the players without their receiving an examination as required by state law.

BSU cager sentenced

BOISE (UPI) — Dave Richardson, a Boise State basketball center arrested in the theft of sleep equipment from the mansion of Idaho potato king J.R. Simplot, has been ordered to serve five years probation.

Richardson and Dave Williams, a Boise State basketball guard, pleaded guilty to grand larceny in the incident this spring.

Both were told by Boise State coach Dave Latta after the arrest that they couldn't return to the team next season.

Part of Richardson's probation and withheld judgment is that he is forbidden to consume alcohol for five years. During court proceedings he acknowledged he had been drinking during the crime.

Prosecutors asked District Judge W.E. Smith to order Richardson to serve four months in the Ada County jail, but Smith declined, saying it would interfere with Richardson's education.

Richardson will be married this weekend, and he plans to redshirt one year and then play basketball for Lamar University in Texas.

Penguins narrow coach field

PITTSBURGH (UPI) — The field of candidates for the Pittsburgh Penguins' head coaching position has been narrowed to four and a decision could be made by Friday, General Manager Baz Bastien says.

Bastien said the selection would be made jointly with the National Hockey League club's president Vince Bartmo, vice president Paul Marha and owners Ed DeBartolo Sr. and Ed Bartolo Jr.

"In my mind, I have a pretty good idea of who I want," Bastien said. "Of course, it will be kicked around by the rest. I'll give it my best shot."

Three of the candidates reportedly still in contention for the job were former head coaches Don Cherry, of the Colorado Rockies; Eddie Johnston, of the Chicago Black Hawks; and Bobby Kromm, of the Detroit Red Wings. All three were fired from those clubs last season.

Geoffrion suffers stroke

ATLANTA (UPI) — Former Atlanta Flames coach Bernard "Boom Boom" Geoffrion said Tuesday he was paralyzed for 48 hours following a stroke last week but adds he expects to be out of the hospital soon.

"I feel a lot better," Geoffrion said by telephone from his bed at an Atlanta hospital.

Geoffrion, the first coach of the hockey club, which is now located in Calgary, has been undergoing continuous treatment and tests since being admitted to Northside Hospital last Thursday.

Hospital officials say Geoffrion is in good condition, describing the 49-year-old NHL Hall of Famer's stroke as "mild."

One American to be in Olympics

STOCKHOLM (UPI) — There will be one American competing in the Moscow Olympics. He is Mike Perry, coach of the Swedish basketball team.

"Mike will definitely be going to Moscow," a spokesman for the Swedish Basketball Association said Wednesday.

Perry, of Kingston, N.Y., flew to Washington to get U.S. State Department permission for the trip last week.

He is now in Poland with the Swedish team.

"The State Department was very disturbed that I was going to Moscow. If they could have, they would have stopped me," Perry told the Basketball Association after his return.

Perry admitted to having doubts about his Moscow trip, said the association spokesman.

"I have lain awake nights sometimes wondering whether it is right or wrong for me to go," the association quoted Perry.

Compensation committee formed

NEW YORK (UPI) — Ray Grebey, head of baseball's Management Council, Wednesday announced the appointment of General Managers Frank Cashen of the New York Mets and Harry Dalton of Milwaukee to a player-management committee to study compensation.

The 4-man committee was agreed upon in the last contract settlement. It is composed of two management representatives and two players and also includes players Bob Boone of Philadelphia and Sal Bando of Milwaukee.

Excessive heat brings complaint from field

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (UPI) — With 100-degree heat and stifling humidity making conditions comparable to playing "in a plastic bag," the weather will be a definite factor in the U.S. Women's Open golf championship which begins Thursday at Richland Country Club.

Forecasters predict no let-up in the searing heat for the duration of the four-day event, crown jewel of women's golf.

"I feel like I was in a plastic bag," a drenched Hollis Stacy, one of only four women even to win two straight U.S. Open titles, said after a practice trek around the rugged 6,229-yard, par 71, Richland layout. "The only place I've been that's hotter, I think, is Singapore."

"The heat is going to be a major factor in this tournament," agreed Nancy Lopez-Melton, one of four LPGA players with more than $100,000 in official tournament earnings this season and the 1979 Player and Rookie of the Year.

"It may be a case of who can last until the final day," Lopez-Melton added. "Some of the players will drop out. And it is going to be difficult to play fast."

The Ladies Professional Golf Association ordered a crackdown on slow play in June but the Open is one of three major tournaments controlled by the United States Golf Association, which also sponsors the Men's and Senior's Opens.

The USGA's P.-J. Boatwright said the heat will be taken into consideration in the pace of the field for the tournament here.

Wilkins sets record

HELINSINKI (UPI) — Mack Wilkins threw the discus a new United States record of 232 feet 10 inches (71.96 meters) at the World Games track and field meet Wednesday.

His throw ranks second best in the 5,000-meters-in-Nairobi Sunday at 13:46.04 at an altitude of 7,700 meters.

It was this performance that prompted him to buy a flight ticket to Helsinki on the next day.

He clocked a stalling 8:17.83 at the lower altitude in the 5,000 meter event.

Bluebonnet bowl plans to upgrade game rating

HOUSTON (UPI) — Directors of the Bluebonnet Bowl, admitting their annual New Year's Eve football game had become a second rate financial attraction, Wednesday announced plans to double the revenue for participating teams, bettering the payoffs for all but the four major bowl games.

"Houston deserves a better bowl than the Bluebonnet Bowl has been," said Vincent Buckley, president of the Bluebonnet board. "We ranked 13th among the 15 bowls around the country in payoffs last year. That's not acceptable to us. We have to do better."

Only the Tangerine and Independence bowls paid less than the $300,404 Purdue and Tennessee split from the 1979 Bluebonnet Bowl. The small game even forced Bluebonnet officials to delay for six months their annual contribution to charity.

"Houston is not a second rate city and doesn't deserve a second rate bowl," said director Lan Bensten, son of Sen. Lloyd Bensten, D-Texas. "We want by Oct. 15 to have $1.1 million in, then we'll know we can net $50,000. That's where we belong. That's where we were in 1970 — fifth (in bowl payoffs)."

Bensten said the Bluebonnet Bowl had stagnated "while everybody else went up. Our seating capacity (50,000 in the Astrodome) didn't go up. Our ticket prices stayed about the same and we lost our major (ABC) TV network."

Buckley, Bensten and Tex Thornton, executive director of the game, said the additional revenues would come primarily from higher ticket prices — $15 each — and the sale of 100 "patrons" memberships at $2,500 each. A minimum of $100,000 is expected this year from broadcast rights held by the independent Mizlou Network.

Bensten said the biggest obstacles to a major network contract were the increased number of bowl games and the limited number of corporate advertising dollars. But he said that larger payoffs for Bluebonnet Bowl participants would attract teams with higher rankings and make the bowl more appealing to the networks.

The game has only sold out the Astrodome four of 12 years and not since 1977 when Texas A&M and Southern Cal appeared.

Gladys Keel: Cinderella of Idaho GOP

By LORAYNE O. SMITH
Times-News writer

HAGERMAN — Back in the '20s Gladys Tertune Keel was the Cinderella of the Idaho Republican Party.

Among the many glamorous and historical events she was captivated into was serving as the official governor of Idaho at the festivities in Washington, D.C., during Herbert Hoover's inauguration.

"I still feel like the person who puts a dollar in a slot machine and hits the jackpot," the attractive 84-year-old ex-political veteran said in discussing her surprising political career more than a half century ago.

While such honors and opportunities to rub shoulders with the cream of society in the nation's capital have long been one of the fringe benefits accruing to the party faithful, the lucky ones who get these political plums usually not only have earned them in terms of service, but probably more important, are adept at winning intra-party power plays.

The incredible thing about Mrs. Keel's career was that she not only hadn't "earned" party recognition; she didn't even belong to the party. Moreover, as a young working girl in Twin Falls she had never even heard of the post of national committeewoman, let alone know what the job entailed.

Which is what lends a Cinderella aspect to her story. One day while she was at work in the farm loan office of J.S. Keel, her future husband, she received a telegram saying she had been chosen as national committeewoman of Idaho.

The 1924 GOP national convention which was to nominate "Silent Cal" Coolidge as the party's standard bearer was under way in Cleveland. The Idaho delegation "was so stupid," Mrs. Keel said, they had not understood a new mandate that it was mandatory each state have a national committeewoman. They had thought it optional, but found they were not legal until a woman was named.

The way she has figured it out, the delegation had to caucus immediately to choose a woman, and all the "party wheelhorses" who were the logical choices were one after the other eliminated because they had offended some delegate or another over the years.

Among Idaho's delegation were such well-known figures as Sen. William E. Borah, Rep. Addison T. Smith (for whom Addison Avenue in Twin Falls is named) and one C.A. Robinson, whom Mrs. Keel described as a "big wheel."

Robinson was well acquainted with Mrs. Keel, because she handled farm loans for Mr. Keel who was a representative of the Holland Land Co. from Amsterdam, Holland.

She had recently wired Robinson for information necessary to completion of a loan, and the delegate still had her telegram in his pocket.

"I think they just got to a stalemate, and casting about in desperation Robinson felt my telegram in his pocket, so suggested my name," she said candidly. "They couldn't be against me," she laughed "because I hadn't ever done anything." Obviously, she was a complete unknown.

The new national committeewoman who was 27 years old wasn't even sure she was a Republican, and to make the story even better, Mr. Keel was a "rabid Democrat."

When the telegram arrived in the loan office the young secretary looked so upset her boss asked her if she had received bad news.

Silently handing him the telegram he said, "For Christ's sake, how did you get this?" Soon an associate, Ora Chapman, dropped in and his comment likewise was asked.

"I'll be damned," he said.

The two men, as well as all the Republicans, could not be blamed for marveling at what seemed an unusual choice for the coveted post, to say the least.

But though the new committeewoman was a novice, she was conscientious and immediately began to try to find out what responsibilities accompanied this unexpected honor. (Robinson had assured her upon returning from the convention that the post was a real honor.)

She visited the state GOP headquarters in Boise where she distinctly got the feeling "they didn't know what to do with that damned woman."

But she showed innate political wisdom by individually seeking each of the female party workers, most of whom were locally affiliated over the choice of a nobody instead of themselves. After she frankly admitted she had no experience for the post, but also pointed out that she had not sought it either, most of them accepted her.

"I had two advantages," she recalls. "I knew I didn't know anything and I could speak in public."

As one way to learn the ABC's of politics she asked for the job as secretary to the Speaker of the House, who was then W.D. Gillis of Piler, at the next meeting of the Idaho Legislature. She held that job for several sessions.

She also plunged into her new job vigorously, speaking at every opportunity, organizing Republican Women's Clubs and was "let's eat and caked to death" over the 10 years she served as national committeewoman.

Along with the hard work at home were the national committee meetings which meant parties with the most dazzling of both American and foreign society.

The Republicans were then in their heyday of national power and happily "skinned the cream off the top," Mrs. Keel said. Receptions for foreign diplomats, and other "beautiful social affairs" were an important part of the national committee gatherings.

Gladys Keel of Hagerman with invitation to Herbert Hoover's inaugural festivities in 1929

The first meeting she attended, the new committeewoman told her fellow delegate, John Thomas Gooding, he would have to escort her as she didn't know her way around. This, he gallantly did.

"The only thing that got me by was my youth," she laughed. "Not one of the 'committeewomen' from other states was under 50, so she had a distinct advantage."

Recalling her first reception at the White House to meet President Coolidge, the Hagerman woman said Silent Cal's hand "might as well have been a bag of wet sand," but his wife, Grace, was a thoroughly gracious woman.

Even the malds took pity on her inexperience. When she and a Wyoming committeewoman naively left their hats in the rest room not realizing they were a social must, a maid gently pointed out they should be worn at the luncheon.

Once in Washington, invitations and contacts "impressive enough to astonish even Cinderella were showered on the young woman who had aroused widespread interest because of her youth. Newsmen dubbed her the "baby of the national committee."

A top society matron invited her to her mansion for lunch, and put a limousine and a burly Negro chauffeur at her disposal. The governor of Kentucky invited her to attend the Kentucky Derby as his guest.

But she was too poor to go. At that point in her life Mrs. Keel, who said she had worked since she was 15, had never owned a car. Her one black velvet dress was used for state occasions for years.

Romance could have made even a more storybook ending to her unsought career, but the young secretary to President Coolidge who early decided the youngest national committeewoman needed an escort to many events, simply did not appeal to the young Idahoan.

However, the interest C. Bascom Slinn (who later wrote a book about Coolidge) took in her resulted not only in gardenias arriving at her hotel, but an invitation to sit with him in the Presidential reviewing stand during Hoover's inaugural parade March 4, 1929.

This was so tempting she couldn't turn it down, despite her official duties as representing Gov. H.C. Baldrige who had given her full

Most oldsters prefer self-reliance to welfare

By PATRICIA MCCORMACK
UPI Health Editor

NEW YORK (UPI) — Most oldsters, pummeled and bruised by inflation, prefer self-reliance to welfare and food stamps, a survey detailing "Trials and Triumphs of Aging in America" reported Wednesday.

Self-reliance displayed by most 60-plus Americans, the study said, appears to be linked with their "general distrust of government."

"The majority doesn't think the government can be trusted to do what is right," the report said.

The study, sponsored by American Healthcare Corp. and conducted by Research and Forecasts Inc., New York, did not include the 4.5 percent of the oldsters in nursing homes, it aimed at the 95.5 percent "hanging in" in the mainstream.

An indication of self-reliance: only 12 percent of those surveyed applied for food stamps, disability or other special government funds last year. Social Security, an earned benefit, excluded.

"That doesn't mean 98 percent of the elderly have spare change [lingering] in their jeans. Even 41 percent of those with incomes over $16,000 a year are cramped by inflation."

The report smashed the stereotype of whimpering, foot-shuffling, scuffed golden-agers huddled in rockers before television sets.

It said Americans 60 and over watch no more television than people in general. The majority watches three hours a day or less.

The 60-and-up set includes "enjoyers," 27 percent; "survivors," 53 percent, and "casualties," 20 percent.

"Enjoyers" live the promise of the golden years traditionally anticipated, but women make up less than half this group (46 percent) though they are 58 percent of the population.

"Survivors" enjoy some but not all of the support system needed for a sense of well-being — and women are 61 percent of this group.

Women are also in the majority, 74 percent, among the "casualties" — chiefly because they tend to have no spouse-of-perceived-equal physical capacity or a high sense of financial security.

Contrary to some notions that the elderly are for the most part sickly and weak, the 60-plus crowd said it is generally healthy. Half consider themselves in good — or excellent — health. A majority said they have no severe physical difficulties.

The only significant widespread physical difficulty that senior citizens report is losing strength in their limbs, and that is reported by only a minority.

Other findings:

—About two-thirds have strong self-images and always feel useful. And more than half have a high degree of optimism about life.

—Chronological age is not a factor in determining a sense of well-being and optimism.

—Well-educated oldsters reported much better health and economic security than others.

Your public library offers many services besides books to read

Heartline is a service for senior citizens. Its purpose is to answer questions and solve problems — fast. If you have a question or a problem not answered in these columns, write Heartline, 114 E. Dayton St., West Alexander, Idaho 45801. You will receive a prompt reply, but you must include a stamped, self-addressed envelope. The most useful replies will be printed in this column.

HEARTLINE: In a recent article you gave some very good advice about community services for the elderly, but you missed one of the best resources in most communities — the public library. Public libraries have many services available. I think you should point this out to your readers.

ANSWER: Yes, there are many services available through most libraries. Too often people think of the library as just a place to get books or a quiet place to read or study. It would be a good idea to visit/browse around and find out what services are available to you.

HEARTLINE: I am inquiring about railroad retirement benefits. I am now receiving a widow's pension. What I want to know is would I be entitled to anything in the way of railroad benefits since I worked on the railroad in 1943 to 1944? I would appreciate any information you can give me. — L.D.A.

ANSWER: We are sorry, but no, you would not be entitled to any railroad annuity. The minimum requirement for entitlement to any annuity under the Railroad Retirement

Act is 120 months of railroad service. Since you stated that you only had two years of service, you would not be eligible. The railroad retirement laws, like the Social Security laws, do not allow for the withdrawal or refund of any employee retirement taxes.

However, the railroad retirement credits of former employees with less than 120 months service are transferred to the Social Security administration and treated as Social Security credits when these former railroad employees apply for Social Security benefits.

HEARTLINE: On vacation my husband and I went to Alaska last summer. We drove through Canada a great deal of the way. On the way home we did stop to visit with our daughter only for a day or so. However, while at my daughter's in Saskatchewan, Saskatchewan, my husband suffered a heart attack.

We was hospitalized for nearly six weeks. When we got home we sent a claim. After waiting four months and making three calls to our local Social Security office we were told that there was a special form for out-of-the-country services.

The next day we went to our social security office to obtain such a claim form. The first two Social Security people we talked to did not know what we were talking about. They never heard of such a special form. We kept insisting that someone in that very office had told us of such a claim form. Finally after making us feel like a nuisance, another person who knew what we were talking about came out. We filled out the claim and sent it in. Now nearly two months later we get a letter saying that none of the services are covered, because they were administered in Canada and Medicare does not cover us in Canada.

We are at wit's end. I was told by a Social Security representative that Medicare is good in Canada if you're coming from Alaska. Can you help us? — J.E.

ANSWER: We checked with your carrier. It was determined that you were not on direct route from Alaska to the United States. Since you live in Oregon, your daughter's home in Canada would be considered too far out of the way to be on direct route from Alaska to your home.

We are sorry, but Medicare will only help cover medical services in Canada if you are: 1) on direct route from Alaska to your home, or 2) in case of emergency if you live near the Canadian border and a Canadian hospital is closer to your home than an American hospital.

Backgammon, an old game, has taken off

By MARK BARABAK
United Press International

Poor Grandpa, wiling away yesterday summer nights on the porch swing with his humble checkerboard, probably never realized what he was missing.

Those funny triangles on the flipside offered a lot more than he might have reckoned — as 20 million Americans and countless backgammon enthusiasts worldwide would attest today.

Long relegated to secondary status, backgammon has taken off. It's a new-found resurgence for a game that's been around so long one wag suggests next to sex, it's civilization's oldest game.

start going out for an evening to play it.

"It's the ideal social situation," muses Players Association President Sid Jackson. "You don't have to throw money around, afford a crazy car or have the stamina to run a marathon. All you need is moderate intelligence and to enjoy the competition."

Boyd claims backgammon "for a long time was a game for the effete and well to do, a very social, high society kind of game."

"In the last 15 years though it's slowly filtered down and more and more people have become interested."

Jackson adds, "The game itself long had the image of sexy, jet setting players flying off to exotic places for tournaments. But it's since transcended that crowd."

Boyd recalls going to a client's home in a poor section of San Francisco several years ago and noticing the children upstairs playing backgammon.

"That's when I decided the game had arrived," he says.

A book buyer for one of the nation's major chain stores indicates sale of backgammon books in their franchises continue to soar.

"It began about a year-and-a-half, two years ago and has carried on. The craze still seems to be going on very strong."

Still, the owner of one Southern California chain of retail gaming stores insists the popularity remains localized, centered mostly in major cities.

"There are a lot of places like Tucson, Ariz. or Muskogee, Okla. It's just catching on; it hasn't had the impact yet it has had here (in Southern California.)"

But he's confident it's just a matter of time.

"It's slowly catching on, like any fad," he predicted, using a word that's anathema to most serious students of the game.

Gladys Keel: GOP Cinderella

proxy to act as Idaho's chief executive during the festivities.

So she asked Rep. Addison Smith if he wouldn't serve as governor while she watched the parade.

While she was appreciative that the governor had designated her to sit in for him, she was again unaware how much protocol would be involved. When she arrived in the capital's old Union depot about 6 a.m., she was greeted by a motorcade of official escorts and found a car at her disposal.

At the inaugural reception each governor occupied a box seat and many guests were momentarily amazed thinking Idaho had a young female top executive. But again pleasure called over duty and the acting "governor" got Rep. Addison Smith to sit in for her so she could relax.

Mrs. Keel was a member of the committee whose job it was to notify Hoover of his nomination at the 1928 convention. The committee traveled to Stanford, Calif., by train with their special car.

She married Mr. Keel in 1936 and for a time "belonged to everything I could get into" plus a heavy schedule of speaking engagements in the party interest, as well as continuing to work in the family business.

She said she ruined her voice since "I had something important to say" and it was before the day of public address systems.

Four years after her marriage and 10 years after her political debut, recurring health problems forced her to resign from everything. She was sure she had ulcers, but tests at the Mayo Clinic confirmed only that she was exceedingly nervous.

When she stepped out of public life she took up gardening and horseback riding and her "ulcers" disappeared. Her private life also somewhat resembles the Cinderella syndrome, at least in that she grew up in poverty. Born March 15, 1886, in White Hall, Ill., she worked to pay her expenses during high school. An elderly uncle kept writing from Idaho urging them to come West.

Since he was a bachelor, Mrs. Keel assumed perhaps he was a rich man; but when she at last saved enough to buy tickets for her mother and two younger sisters to Shoshone, they were disappointed to find the relative was a sheepherder, poor as they were.

Mrs. Keel worked at the Lincoln County clerk's office in Shoshone and spent one summer in Halley when the former Alturas County was divided into present-day Blaine, Lincoln, Camas and Gooding counties. She transferred county records for the then excellent salary of $1 per hour, working 10 hours a day.

She recalls having a "fabulous summer" at the old Hiawatha Hotel where room and meals served on white tablecloths cost only $50 per month. While there she met Pete Bethune, a sheepman, who urged her to come to Twin Falls where he knew Mr. Keel was seeking a long-term job.

Keel later was associated in the firm of Keel-Wilkison and Strouk, a longtime lumber business in Twin Falls.

After Mr. Keel's death in 1944 she was elected land manager of the Holland Land firm and worked four years winding up land sales.

In 1969, she moved to Hagerman where she has land on scenic Billings Creek. Although the deed is in the past, she has memories enough with official invitations and letters in a small manilla envelope marked "political memoirs" to last a lifetime.

Seniors keep their religious beliefs

WASHINGTON (UPI) — Senior citizens overwhelmingly maintain their religious beliefs into old age and a large majority believe in life after death, a new study said today.

"More than half, 55 percent, report that they attend religious services nearly every week," the study said. "Six percent of that total report daily attendance at services."

Some 18 percent said they hardly ever or never attend religious services. When questioned about death, the survey reported, "a great majority, 74 percent, expressed belief in a life after death while even more, 83 percent, expressed no fear of death, correlating the acceptance of death with their religious beliefs."

The study was commissioned by Americana Healthcare Corporation, a private provider of nursing and rehabilitative services for the elderly. It was based on a national representation of noninstitutionalized Americans over the age of 60.

The study said 98 percent said they had formal ties to religious organizations and more than two-thirds identified themselves as Protestant, more than one fourth said they were Roman Catholics. Small percentages said they were Jewish, non-Jewish or non-Christian.

Nearly 90 percent of those questioned said their religious beliefs were very or fairly important and 94 percent said they believed God responds in some way to prayer and 89 percent said they call on their religious faith in times of stress and unhappiness.

Yet, the survey said that in cross-tabulating the findings about religious beliefs against the elderly's feeling of self-confidence, optimism and loneliness, it appeared that "high religiosity has no relationship to senior citizens' optimism, nor does a lack of religious beliefs lead to morale problems."

When family tree is shaken, surprises may tumble out

By ABIGAIL VAN BUREN
© Universal Press Syndicate

DEAR ABBY: I just received a copy of my family history.

My aunt traced our family roots and had copies made to distribute to members of our family. Here is what I learned:

My mother was married twice. (My brother and I were shocked. Now Mom feels guilty because she kept this from us.)

My cousin was adopted. (I never knew it. He doesn't know it himself, but now he's sure to find out.)

Another cousin was three months pregnant when she got married. (Grandma didn't know it. Now she does.)

A man whom we all loved and thought to be our uncle is just a man our aunt has been living with out of wedlock for 15 years.

At first I was excited about knowing more about my family background, but I sure didn't find anything to brag about.

Several family members asked this aunt who was doing all the searching to please not record all this stuff she dug-up. Her reply was, "Facts are facts."

Well, how about a person's right to privacy?

—KNOWS TOO MUCH

DEAR KNOWS: Facts ARE facts. Remember, a person is responsible only for his own actions, not what his cousin, mother, aunt or uncle has done.

Furthermore, when one starts to shake his family tree, anything is apt to fall out, including lemons, dingbats and an occasional son of a bitch.

DEAR ABBY: I have often heard that the first romance is always the most thrilling, regardless of how many love affairs come later. Do you go along with that?

—REMINISCING

DEAR REMINISCING: No. It just seems that way because at the time you had nothing to compare it with.

DEAR ABBY: I hope you can help. I have a 19-year-old son who has had since infancy a habit of "rocking," at night he rocks his body back and forth. He even does this in his sleep.

He went desperately to break himself of this habit, as he wants to go into the service. If he does, this babyish habit will soon be discovered, and he will be the butt of many jokes and much ridicule.

He went to college for a short time, but before he went, I took him to a hypnotist. She gave him tapes to play before going to sleep, but that didn't help.

I also took him to a mental health clinic. He went only once and was told it was a mother-son related habit — an unconscious desire to return to the comfort of his baby days. F

He even tried fastening bells on his wrist to wake him when he starts to rock. That didn't help, either. Have you, or any of your readers, ever heard of a problem like this? And if there is a solution, please hurry your response.

—ROCKING PROBLEM

DEAR ROCKING: You were on the right track when you took your son to the mental health clinic. Unfortunately, he didn't stay with it long enough to overcome his problem. If he is ever to break the rocking habit, he'll need more psychotherapy. And if that doesn't work, there are worse things to live with.

—CONFIDENTIAL TO ALL PARENTS: Parents who want to "train a child in the way HE should go" should go that way themselves.

At Wit's End Her legs represent 35 million of us

By ERMA BOMBECK
© Field Enterprises, Inc.

According to the story in the Boston Herald American, it was one of those warm show-and-tell moments in running history.

Four-time Marathon winner Bill Rodgers was exchanging memories of the race with the alleged first-place woman winner, Rosie Ruiz.

"It was a bitch out there today, wasn't it?" he asked, referring to the heat. He noted she didn't seem to be breathing hard.

Then he observed she didn't seem to know much about running. She didn't even look tired.

Finally, Charle Rodgers joined his brother at the interview platform and iced everyone's suspicions with, "Look at her legs! They look like Erma Bombeck's!"

That's when the credibility began to crumble.

Now, I hope all of you realize what is at stake here. It has nothing to do with who ran the race or who didn't. My legs are on the line.

And very frankly, my legs represent a majority in this country. There are conservatively 35 million of us who regard pantyhose commercials as science fiction. Trust me. Any political-candidate-who-courts-the-bloomy knees vote and gets it, can pick out his dish pattern at the White House.

Heaven knows we've tried to live in harmony with women runners. Take those little shorts with the racing vent which we invented to give us extra leg room. We were glad to share the style with runners.

And don't we restrain our dogs when women runners are warming up on fire hydrants and street signs, stretching their calf muscles and hamstrings?

I personally, make it a point not to notice a prominent quadricip muscle when a female runner is out in public and trying to have a good time.

Why, my sorority even adopted a woman runner for Christmas last year. There were tears in our eyes as we presented her with a turkey stuffed with dressing, pumpkin pie with whipped cream and a pair of long warm-up pants to cover those pitiful muscular legs that looked like an unpaved road.

Yes, for every pair of legs pounding the pavement at Boston, there were 8,000 of them like mine that stretched out on a chaise, reached for an accelerator pedal, tucked under and supported a good book, or balanced a dessert.

I wouldn't be surprised if Rosie had heard the remark and answered, "Thank you."

TWIN FALLS — Debra Ann Skrederstu of Twin Falls and Stephen James Davis of Boise exchanged wedding vows May 31 at 2 p.m. in St. Stephen's Episcopal Church in Boise.

Rev. James H. Davis assisted by Rev. Michael Mahoney officiated at the double ring ceremony.

The bride is the daughter of R.L. Skrederstu and Mrs. Mona Skrederstu, both of Twin Falls. The bridegroom's parents are the Rev. and Mrs. James H. Davis of Boise.

The bride wore a chapel train gown of white dotted swiss over satin featuring a, eleven gore skirt with seed pearl lace trim. Her double illusion veil was topped with a crown of seed pearls and she carried a bouquet of white daisies tied with white satin streamers.

Maid of honor was Jocelyn Higginbotham and bridesmaids were Jane Defenbach, Lisa Wagner, Laurie Skrederstu, Tammy Skrederstu, Debbie Thompson and Dana Mikesell.

The best man was James Carlson and ushers were Kevin McClen, Ken Stringfield, Lance Stromberg, Doug Griffin, Larry Haughness and Craig Carter.

Flower girl SueAnn Olinger scattered pink rose petals from a white crocheted basket made by Susan Reeder for the bride.

Wedding music was played by Frances Baker, organist. Roger Reddick sang, accompanying himself on the guitar. The bride's mother and grandmother each gave a reading during the ceremony.

A reception was held at the bridegroom's home. The bride's table, under a colorful canopy, held a four-tiered wedding cake decorated with pastel flowers topped with a bride and groom. Reddick played guitar numbers.

Leslie Davis, sister of the bridegroom, attended the guest book and Sheila Charlton cut the bride's cake.

Special guests included Mr. and Mrs. Don Olinger, grandparents of the bride, and Mrs. F.E. Ruby, grandmother of the bridegroom.

Following a wedding trip to Sun Valley, the couple will make their home in Laramie, Wyo., where the bridegroom is attending graduate school at the University of Wyoming.

Plant expands

HUNTSVILLE, Ala. (UPI) — Capacity at the world's largest plant devoted to production of aircraft windshields, canopies, and windows, the PPG-Industries plant in Huntsville, is being expanded by one-third with completion scheduled this year. The company operates similar plants in Pennsylvania and California.

The cake was made and decorated by Mrs. Dolph Hitesman, the wedding dress was made by Mrs. Harold Southwick, both of Glenns Ferry, both aunts of the bride. Mrs. Avery Betty of Boise and Mrs. Matt Betty of Star cut and served the cake.

Michelle Southwick, cousin of the bride, registered the guests. Mrs. Mark Hitesman of Mountain Home and Melissa Betty of Boise were in charge of the gift table.

Special guests were Mrs. Margaret Betty of Boise, grandmother of the bride, and Mr. and Mrs. Peter McIntosh of Mountain Home, grandparents of the bridegroom. Others attended from Yakima, Wash., Boise, Middleton and King Hill.

The couple will reside in Glenns Ferry where he is employed by the Glenns Ferry police department and the bride teaches adult education classes.

Apricot use

WALNUT CREEK, Calif. (UPI) — If you've been wondering why fresh apricot prices remain relatively high, compared with other fresh fruit, consider this: only 6 percent of the crop is sold raw. Canning accounts for 60 percent, drying, 25 percent, and freezing for institutional use, 9-10 percent.

This year's California apricot crop is expected to total 130,000 tons. The fruits are slightly larger than usual because of unusually cool spring weather led to slower ripening. Fresh apricots are nationally available through August.

Certain medicines sometimes will control menstrual pain

Dear Dr. Lamb,
I'm 23 years old and have two children. My first period started when I was 13 and I had severe cramps. I've had them ever since then except when I was pregnant. I've been to see several gynecologists and one suggested I needed to see a psychiatrist. I don't have enough money to pay for that. The gynecologist told me I had fibroids on top of my uterus on the left side but they should not be causing the pain I described.

For the past three months I've had cramps lasting two days. This is very inconvenient since I work. About three days before my period my body starts discharging heat. I can feel the heat coming from my pores until the heat stops and I lose most of the weight. Also at this time I'm very irritable and can become enraged at the least excitement. I'm fine again until two weeks after my period when the weight gain starts and the whole thing starts again. Any suggestions would be appreciated.

menstruation in some women who have painful menstrual cramps. This is particularly true in women who have what we called primary dysmenorrhea.

Recent studies have identified the presence of the increased amounts of prostaglandin in the menstrual secretions. With this discovery, it has been found that in some of these women certain medicines will control the cramps. This includes Motrin, Indocin, Fonal and Naprosyn.

There are some side effects with some of these medicines—and, of course, these are all prescription items but it might be worth discussing the trial of these with your physician. You can take my column along as the source of this suggestion if you wish to do so.

You also seem to be describing the premenstrual-tensions that some women experience. This includes the retention of fluid in the last half of the cycle leading up to the time of menstruation. Some women benefit by taking a diuretic which helps to flush out the excess water at that phase of the cycle.

Readers who want information about hysterectomies, cystoceles and rectoceles can send 75 cents with a long, stamped, self-addressed envelope for The Health Letter number 14-12. Address your request to Dr. Lamb, in care of this newspaper, P.O. Box 1551, Radio City Station, New York, NY 10019.
