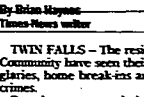
Joyce Larna heads the neighborhood watch program at the Sky Lane Community in Twin Falls. She has seen a significant drop in the number of police calls to her area.

Public awareness, meth crackdown lead to drop in property crime

By Brian Haynes
Times-News writer

TWIN FALLS – The residents of Sky Lane Community have seen their share of car burglaries, home break-ins and other property crimes.

But when someone slashed the tires of five cars in one night about a year ago, managers Joyce and Bob Larna decided they had had enough.



"We felt violated," Joyce Larna said. "We had people coming in and slashing tires, and we didn't like that."

So they started a neighborhood watch program, enlisted interested residents and organized regular meetings.

A year later the number of police visits to the Twin Falls mobile home park has been cut in half, Joyce Larna said.

Programs such as the one at Sky Lane Community were one reason property crime fell more than 16 percent throughout the Magic Valley, law enforcement officials said.

But they also point to the crackdown on methamphetamine users, who were believed to be behind a majority of missing property in the area.

Home safety tips

- Trim shrubs and bushes away from doors and windows. Thick foliage helps hide burglers from sight.
- Use wooden sticks or pins to keep windows and sliding glass doors from sliding open for the wrong person.
- Install double-deadbolt locks on doors.
- Place signs or stickers around homes warning of an alarm. These can scare a burglar whether you have a system or not.
- Consider installing a burglar alarm. It can provide an extra layer of protection and reduce insurance rates.
- Start or join a neighborhood watch program. Contact your local law enforcement agency for more information.

In the past couple of years, local law enforcement agencies have focused on busting the drug user, curbing the demand for methamphetamine, marijuana and other illegal drugs, Twin Falls County Sheriff Wayne Tousley said.

Many of those users were suspected of stealing on a regular basis to support their habits, but if they're in jail they can't steal, he said.

Cassia County, where property crimes dropped more than 17 percent in 1998, has seen similar results, Sheriff Billy Crystal said.

The combination of meth arrests and improved crime-fighting technology have helped push down property crime numbers, he said.

But police and community programs don't fully explain crime rates, Twin Falls police Sgt. Don Hall said.

Socioeconomic factors play a role in the ups and downs of crime rates every year and are beyond anyone's control. But that doesn't mean people can't take steps to protect themselves, he said.

Simply trimming high shrubs that cover windows and locking doors can help burglar-proof a home. Unfortunately many people wait until after they've been a crime victim to take preventative steps, he said.

That's what happened at Sky Lane Community, but since Joyce and Bob Larna took action it's a safer place to live, and the troublemakers aren't making trouble anymore, Bob Larna said.

"Somehow or another they just realize there are more eyes watching than there used to be," he said.

Serbs are ahead of schedule

NATO attempts to rein in rebels

The Associated Press

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia – Packing into armored vehicles, trucks and buses, Serb troops accelerated their pullout from Kosovo on Saturday and NATO said the soldiers may be gone well ahead of their midnight deadline tonight.

Peacekeepers met with ethnic Albanian rebels in an attempt to prevent them from embarking on a new reign of terror to fill the vacuum left by the retreating Serbs.

On the streets of Pristina, the Kosovo capital, the number of NATO security checkpoints grew noticeably, especially in the neighborhood of the rebels' offices.

But the climate of violence persisted. Three Serbs were killed and a fourth badly wounded – each with a shot to the forehead – in the village of Belo Polje near Pec on Saturday. Near Gnjilane, where U.S. peacekeepers have their headquarters, Marines arrested a Serb for allegedly killing one man and wounding two others in a sniper attack.

There were about 40,000 Yugoslav troops in Kosovo before an international peace deal reached June 9 ended NATO's 78-day bombing campaign against Yugoslavia. Only 3,000 to 5,000 remain, and "it would not be unreasonable to expect" that they could all be gone by noon Sunday, peacekeepers' spokesman Lt. Col. Robin Clifford said.

In Mitrovica, the province's northernmost major city, a convoy of about 50 armored vehicles, trucks and buses carrying soldiers and Serb special police pulled out on Saturday and French peacekeeping troops were out in force. An apartment block was on fire; neighbors said one of the units was occupied by Serb police who torched it as they were leaving.

Peacekeeping officials talked with the Kosovo Liberation Army about how the ethnic Albanian rebels will demilitarize, as required under the Kosovo peace plan. No details of the meeting were available, but KLA officials said talks would continue Sunday.

NATO spokesman Jamie Shea said Thursday that NATO wants the KLA to give up their heavy weapons over a 30-day period and ban military parades and uniforms.

Mehmet Hajrizi, a top KLA leader, said Saturday that the rebel group intends to "transform itself into a security force for Kosovo," an unpalatable prospect to the province's remaining Serbs.

In Prizren, Kosovo's second-largest city, the KLA has appointed a city administration and police force. Its members even detained Albanians accused of looting Serb houses on Saturday.

The rebels also are running afoul of NATO. In Pec, rebels commandeered a Serb-run grocery store, but Italian forces moved in with armored vehicles, forcing the rebels to give up their weapons.

Whole lotta Regatta

By John T. Huddy
Times-News writer

BURLEY – With less than a week to go, residents and out-of-towners are getting ready for the thrills, chills and spills of this year's Idaho Regatta.

The Mini-Cassia event draws racers and spectators from all parts of Idaho, Utah and even as far as California. Hotels fill to capacity, and in general, the pace of business accelerates. Police plan ahead too – although they say Regatta weekend is fairly close to business as usual.

Water safety –B3

"We've been preparing for at least 18 months," said Mark Maier, chairman of the Regatta committee. "We evaluate everything that happened the last year and make improvements on them."

When the Regatta hits town, the action won't just be on the water. It comes down to security, safety and sales. And, come race time, it comes

Founder of dads' special day left a big legacy

The Associated Press

SPOKANE, Wash. – Dads getting new ties today, or just spending the day kicking back, owe a debt to the mother of Father's Day.

Without Sonora Smart Dodd, the third Sunday of each June might be just another day for lawn-mowing and endless to-do lists.

In 1909, when she was 27, she listened to a Sunday sermon about Mother's Day and wondered why there was no corresponding day for fathers.

Dodd believed the nation didn't show enough respect to fathers, citing popular songs of the day such as "Father, Dear Father, Come Home with Me Now" and "Everybody Works but Father."

Dodd "was a real promoter and had lots of charm," said Don Ball, whose family opened a funeral home with the Dodds in the 1930s that is still in business today. "She was so well-known around town as a poet, a scribe and a sculptor."

She promoted Father's Day "out of love for her father," recalled Ball, 72, who knew Dodd from childhood.

Today, about 97 million Father's Day cards

Idaho: A series of weather disturbances brought a wide array of cloud cover to the gem state this afternoon, from mostly cloudy skies over southeastern Idaho to mostly sunny skies over southwestern and central Idaho. However, by late afternoon, satellites indicated increasing clouds over the northern part of the state.

Temperatures across Idaho were cooler than Friday, with afternoon highs in the 70s and 80s common. The extremes were at Mountain Home and Sun Valley, with afternoon temperature of 84 degrees.

Elsewhere: Torrential rain pounded Oklahoma on Saturday, and thunderstorms also spread across southern sections of Texas and Florida.

Rainfall amounts included 4.6 inches at Blackwell and 3.01 inches at Burbank, the National Weather Service said.

The weather service warned that the Salt Fork River would crest at 2 feet above flood stage Sunday at Tonkawa. – The Associated Press

Accident seriously injures horror author

LEWISTON, Maine (AP) – Horror author Stephen King was seriously injured when he struck by a van while walking Saturday, police said.

King was walking south on the shoulder of Route 5 in North Lovell, where he owns a home, at about 4:30 p.m. when a motorist approaching from behind lost control of his Dodge Caravan because of a dog that was running loose inside, Oxford County Sheriff's deputy Matt Baker said.

Officials at Central Maine Medical Center said the 51-year-old King, who was in serious condition, was conscious at about 8:30 p.m.

King's family asked that no information about his injuries be released, hospital spokesman Randy Dustin said.

King was first taken to Northern Cumberland Memorial Hospital in Bridgton but was flown to Central Maine Medical for treatment at the hospital's trauma ward.

Baker said that according to witnesses, the driver, Bryan Smith, 41, of Fryeburg, did not appear to be speeding. He said charges will not be filed against Smith.

are purchased annually in the United States, according to the Greeting Card Association, an industry group. It is the fifth-largest card-sending occasion, following Christmas, Valentine's Day, Mother's Day and Easter.

Dodd's campaign was an uphill struggle at first.

"One group of men conventioneers laughed and said they didn't want a Father's Day," according to a 1965 article in The Spokesman-Review. "A national fishing day would be better, they told her."

But Dodd persuaded the Spokane Ministerial Association and local YMCA to pass a resolution in support of Father's Day, and the first local observance was held June 19, 1910. Her effort is commemorated on a plaque outside the downtown Y.

The first Father's Day was community-oriented.

"The original Father's Day Association ... and groups of Spokane women prepared home dinners, gathered roses for sacred commemoration and made gifts for shut-in fathers," Dodd said in a 1965 speech for dedication of the YMCA plaque.

Her idea spread to other cities, and celebrities including orator William Jennings Bryan joined the campaign for a national observance.

"Both Father's and Mother's days rest substantially upon the same commandment, 'Honor thy father and thy mother,'" wrote Bryan, a three-time presidential hopeful, in a 1910 letter to Dodd.

President Woodrow Wilson added his support, and Congress passed a resolution proclaiming a Father's Day in 1914. It became a national holiday when President Richard Nixon signed a declaration in 1972.

Regatta

Keeping in line

Despite paid attendance of more than 5,000 people for the three days of racing, things remain under control.

"We have the Idaho State Police task force that comes down and we also work very closely with the Cassia County Sheriff's Department," Maier said. "We use off-duty officers who are in uniform for the event along with police reserve officers."

Maier said more than $4,000 from this year's $92,000 Regatta budget has been spent on security. The officers know how to keep event-goers in line.

"We might have one person arrested per year at the Regatta," said Tim Little, a detective with the Cassia County Sheriff's Department. "People are pretty good at the event."

Little said the sheriff's department prepares for the weekend and boosts its police presence. But arrests don't increase during Regatta weekend.

"The crowds are held down pretty well," Little said. "We prepare for the Regatta. That means we're ready if something happens, but nothing ever does."

Safe waters

Maier said the committee has also tried to enhance the event's family aspect.

A children's area will be set up, along with a family viewing section. Water safety is also a prime focus for event organizers and local officials, Maier said.

Little said the sheriff's department will close down the Snake River to general boat traffic between the Overland Bridge in Burley to the island northeast of the Burley City Golf Course Marina. The sheriff's department will cite any boaters who go beyond the restricted points.

Jet boats have the potential to flip, but Little doesn't recall any serious injuries over the past few years.

"There is an average of three overturned boats in the Regatta per year," Little said. "In every case though, the drivers have been safe."

Until this year, the Cassia County Sheriff's Department's marine patrol was in charge of performing rescue operations. This year, the marine patrol will continue to work areas outside the race area, but rescues will be a job for Kent Spaulding, a diving instructor and local water enthusiast.

"We basically sit inside the course and wait for something to happen," Spaulding said. "We have two divers on the boat to take care of the driver. Then we have another boat waiting on the other side of the race course to handle the overturned boat."

Spaulding has been helping with Regatta rescue efforts for more than 10 years. Along with his volunteer efforts in the Regatta, Spaulding also helps the sheriff's department with water rescues. The Regatta proves to be quite a responsibility, though.

"We got a lot riding on it," Spaulding said. "We are responsible for the driver and other boats out there too."

Water isn't as high as it was in 1997, when the Regatta was canceled. But this year's high water could make things a bit more interesting for racers, Little said.

"With high water levels on the river, there will be more water capacity which will affect racers' turns," Little said. "The race boat drivers will have to use extreme caution."

Cutting loose

Maier said the Regatta generates at least $500,000 each year. Gas stations, restaurants and hotels make money serving spectators and racers.

The 126-room Burley Best Western Hotel and Convention Center and its sister hotel, the 139-room Budget Inn next door, book a year in advance for racing weekend, said Stacy Konrad, director of sales for Burley Inn Inc.

"As racers and spectators check out, they book rooms for the following year's event," she said. "There is a great demand for rooms."

Konrad is expecting a lot of repeat customers.

"A lot of people are loyal to this event," Konrad said. "I've been working here for six years and during that time I've got to know a lot of our customers on a first-name basis."

And that, she said, helps keep a lid on fights and rowdy behavior.

"We have very minimal problems here," she said. "This is a time for people to cut loose and have a good time."

A need for speed

On average, more than 60 flat-bottom boat racing teams participate in the Regatta, while more than six drag-boat teams race. Some boats can reach speeds in excess of 100 mph. Sharp turns and high speeds make for a thrill ride for the drivers, and a spectacular exhibition for the audience, Maier said.

Glen Dilworth and his boat "Summer Thunder" will race this year. Dilworth has been competing in the competition jet boat event for the last few years. He said the Idaho Regatta is one of the sport's biggest racing events of the year. Racers seek trophies and cash prizes, and national recognition.

Teens at youth violence summit point to need for supportive adults

The Washington Post

DENVER – Two months after the mass shooting at Columbine High School, hundreds of Coloradans gathered Saturday for a summit on youth violence and heard a relatively simple message from high school students: Parents should spend more time with their children and do a better job of instilling values.

"We need to attack the roots," observed Estee Blatter, a 17-year-old who will be a senior at Columbine when school resumes in mid-August. "Our main problem is at home."

Blatter was one of about two dozen Colorado high school students who kicked off the day-long discussion of school safety and violence at the Metropolitan State College of Denver. Originally scheduled for this fall but moved up because of the April 20 assault at Columbine that left 15 dead, the summit drew local, state and federal officials, clergy, youth workers and various experts. But it was the children – many of them profoundly affected by what happened at the school in Littleton – who seemed to best cut through the clutter and speak from the heart.

"The reason I turned out good is I was blessed with a mother who still built me up regardless of what other people thought of me," said Julian Gilbert, a young African American from Denver. "That's what a lot of parents need to do."

Largely ignoring what has been a raging national debate over cultural decline, the impact of violent mass media and the easy availability of guns, Gilbert and his peers returned repeatedly to their simple message: Parents and school administrators alike need to be more supportive, more caring and more nurturing.

In opening the conference, Colorado Gov. Bill Owens (R) touched on that subject, but dwelt far longer on the consistent Republican theme in the wake of Columbine – that the spate of school shootings attests to a loss of moral values, abetted by an increasingly violent mass media.

"We gather together here as a society because we are afraid," said Owens. "We are afraid something has gone profoundly wrong in our state and in our nation... How much of the youth violence problem stems from the fact that too much of America seems to have lost its moral compass?"

GOP senator calls for action on DOE

WASHINGTON (AP) – Calling for an overhaul of the Energy Department, Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., accused the Clinton administration Saturday of taking "half measures" in dealing with security at nuclear weapons laboratories.

Kyl used the Republican Party's weekly radio address to call for approval of legislation that would create a largely autonomous agency within DOE to deal with nuclear weapons programs and the three weapons research labs.

Energy Secretary Bill Richardson has strongly opposed such an agency and said this week it was "not good logic" to insulate the nuclear weapons programs within an agency that would not be responsible to other parts of the department.

He has compared it to creating a new "fiefdom" in a department that historically has had problems with controlling the independent-minded weapons labs.

But Kyl noted that a special panel of President Clinton's own Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board last week, after a 90-day review of security at DOE, recommended a semiautonomous agency be made responsible for the nuclear weapons programs.

The panel, headed by former Republican Sen. Warren Rudman of New Hampshire, said the department has had a "cavalier attitude" about security for decades. While it praised Richardson's moves to improve security, it also said the DOE "bureaucracy is quite capable of undoing reforms" the secretary is making.

"We call the administration to cooperate with us, not to be satisfied with half measures," Kyl said.

"Since our proposal is exactly what the president's own panel now has recommended, we hope that he and his secretary of energy will work with us to get our bill passed quickly."

Hospital siege suspect appears in court

NORRISTOWN, Pa. (AP) – A former nurse arrested after a deadly two-day hostage standoff at the state mental hospital was arraigned Saturday, appearing disoriented and badly injured.

Dennis Czajkowski, 40, is accused of bursting into Norristown State Hospital on Wednesday, firing several shots, and taking nursing supervisors Carol Sue Kepner, 54, and Maria G. Jordan, 37, captive. The women had played a role in his dismissal in April, state police said.

After a 46-hour standoff, police broke a window to a room where Czajkowski was holed up Friday morning, and he opened fire, killing Ms. Kepner and hitting Ms. Jordan in the chest and abdomen. She was hospitalized in fair condition Saturday.

At his arraignment, Czajkowski said he didn't remember what happened and refused to sign documents indicating the charges had been read to him.

Czajkowski was covered with cuts and bruises when he emerged from an unmarked police car before the court proceedings.

Mattel stifles Tarzan toy's arm motion

EL SEGUNDO, Calif. (AP) – Mattel Inc. is changing the packaging of its Tarzan action figure after some people said the doll's movements were sexually suggestive.

The problem is that the spring-loaded arm can be pumped rapidly up-and-down from Tarzan's chest to below his loin cloth, a motion that some people call suggestive.

Although nobody has complained to the company, Tarzan's performance has been noted in messages on some Internet chat rooms since the doll reached stores about three weeks ago.

"That right arm is the topic of controversy," Mattel spokeswoman Sara Rosales acknowledged Saturday. "I think this is where adults look at things through a different set of eyes. Kids have a much more innocent concept."

No changes will be made to the doll itself.

Debate turns to negotiators

House/Senate panel will talk

WASHINGTON (AP) – With the death of the House's gun-control bill, Congress' response to a rash of school shootings now rests with a small panel of lawmakers whose talks will start with the stricter Senate measure that had been opposed by the National Rifle Association.

Even as they left behind the marathon proceedings Friday, lawmakers of both parties were girding for battle.

They immediately began blaming each other for the 280-147 defeat of a gun-control bill only two months after bloody school shootings in Colorado and Georgia.

President Clinton, in his weekly radio address today, called the situation in Congress unacceptable.

"We can't allow the gun lobby to rewrite our laws and undermine our values," the president said in the broadcast, taped at the summit of world leaders in Cologne, Germany.

To House members, Clinton said, "You've still got an opportunity, and you've still got an obligation, to do the right thing and pass real legislation that will strengthen our gun laws, not weaken them."

End embargoed material

Meanwhile, both sides huddled on strategy for looming negotiations between a small committee of House and Senate lawmakers that will be controlled by Republicans.

Minority Whip David Bonior, D-Mich., said House Democrats are counting on Clinton to lead the charge for the Senate's proposed new gun controls.

Meanwhile, Democratic leaders will dispatch pro-gun-control women lawmakers to make the same pitch.

They will be led by Rep. Carolyn McCarthy of New York, whose husband was shot and killed on a Long Island commuter train, Gephardt said.

Asked why, he replied: "Because they're mothers" with an "earnestness and passion" that makes an impression with voters.

Although he voted for the Senate bill, Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., said he hoped the final product "will be something close to what the House has done. They've done good work."

Democrats go separate gun control way

WASHINGTON (AP) – Most of the 45 House Democrats who bucked their party by voting to loosen background checks at gun shows hail from districts with lots of hunters or other conservative voters.

They're much more likely than other Democrats to have received donations from the National Rifle Association. And some had to stave off strong Republican challenges last fall.

"Democrats are reflecting, in many of these cases, their constituents and their districts," said Democratic political consultant Peter Fenn.

The bill that carried the divisive amendment ultimately failed in the House on Friday, but the battle over the amendment suggests that many Democrats learned a lesson from the 1994 election.

That year, the NRA and other gun groups helped the GOP capture the House for the first time in 40 years in part by hammering Democrats for votes to ban assault-style firearms and to give authorities up to five days to check backgrounds on those seeking to buy handguns.

At the same time, 37 of the 45 Democrats who defected on the gun show amendment later voted with their party to defeat the larger bill, which Democratic leaders said didn't go far enough to control guns. The 45 party defectors were led by Rep. John Dingell of Michigan, who sponsored the amendment that would have loosened some existing restrictions on firearms sales at gun shows. An avid hunter and former NRA board member, Dingell once described agents of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms as "jackbooted American fascists."

Although Dingell's district is mostly suburbs south of Detroit, hunting is popular throughout the state. Most of the Democratic defectors regularly oppose gun control measures.

Among the dissenters were most of the House's "blue dog" group of conservative Democrats, including four of the five Democrats who voted to impeach President Clinton last December: Reps. Charles Stenholm and Ralph Hall of Texas, Virgil Goode of Virginia and Gene Taylor of Mississippi.

NRA achieves lobby goal: Prevent change

By Edward Walsh, Roberto Suro
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON – The day before the House of Representatives began considering gun control last week, James Jay Baker sat in his office over a Capitol Hill saloon calculating vote counts for different versions of a bill requiring background checks on firearms sales at gun shows.

"We have to be ready for anything," said the chief lobbyist for the National Rifle Association. "But," he added a moment later, "nothing is better than anything."

Nothing is exactly what the House produced with Friday's vote to reject new gun show background checks, handing the NRA its most dramatic legislative victory in years. For Baker the vote confirmed his return from four years of exile imposed by NRA hard-liners who thought him too willing to compromise with gun control advocates. The outcome was particularly sweet for Baker because it was engineered with the help of an old ally who had also been squeezed out of the NRA inner circle, Rep. John D. Dingell, D-Mich.

From the outset of the House debate, it was clear the NRA would play a key role. When House Republicans unveiled their gun show proposal June 7, President Clinton immediately denounced it as "ghostwritten by the NRA" and claimed it would gut the gun show bill adopted by the Senate in May. At the time, Baker and GOP leaders knew that Dingell had already drafted an amendment to the Republican bill that would further weaken the Senate provision and make the package much more to the NRA's liking, according to congressional officials and other sources.

"From the beginning Republicans knew that John Dingell, the most senior Democrat in the House, would be there to give them cover from Clinton, the gun control groups or anyone else who wanted to make this a partisan issue," said a source familiar with the deal.

In the end it was the amendment crafted by Dingell and the NRA that killed the gun legislation in the House. On the surface, the proposal satisfied the demand that all firearm sales at gun shows be subject to criminal background checks. But it did this in a way that would weaken the existing system of background checks that now applies to a majority of gun show sales.

Under current law, unlicensed dealers at gun shows are not required to perform background checks, but licensed dealers, who account for the majority of gun show sales, must perform checks that can take up to three business days. In the guise of extending gun show background checks to cover unlicensed sellers, critics charged, Dingell's proposal would instead drastically weaken the existing system by slashing the time allowed to 24 hours.

With the encouragement of President Clinton and Attorney General Janet Reno, Democrats turned on the final gun show legislation, and it was defeated 280 to 147.

The outcome on the House floor Friday was the culmination of an NRA lobbying campaign that spent $1.5 million in May and June, including $750,000 for mailings to members nationwide, $300,000 for phone bank operations and an extensive media buy of ads on conservative radio talk shows.

Letters warning of dire consequences and urging quick action poured out of Baker's office to NRA members. The organization broadcast commercials in selected congressional districts against gun control. As the showdown approached, NRA lobbyists were available on Capitol Hill to press the association's point of view on wavering House members.

Hillary Clinton leads in political poll

NEW YORK – New Yorkers are unfazed by her out-of-state address. They don't see a problem with her role as First Lady, and they worry least of all what independent prosecutor Kenneth Starr might say about her.

Statewide, voters would elect Hillary Rodham Clinton anyway – and by a hefty eight-point margin – if her presumed matchup for U.S. Senate against Mayor Rudy Giuliani were held today, a new Sunday News poll shows.

The random survey of 805 registered state voters, compiled over two days last week, found Clinton besting Giuliani 47 percent to 39 percent, the widest lead the First Lady has enjoyed since pollsters began focusing on the race in April.

More than two-thirds of those polled said that Clinton's status as a "carpetbagger" – as Giuliani has sought to portray her – would have no effect on their vote. A full 73 percent added that her role as First Lady should pose no conflict in her race to fill the seat being vacated next year by Sen. Daniel Moynihan, D-N.Y.

Politics in brief

Gore stresses education to Hispanic voters

PHILADELPHIA – Vice President Al Gore made a pitch to Hispanic voters Saturday by stressing education as a top way to extend prosperity enjoyed by "Latino business owners" to unskilled workers and immigrants.

Speaking in Spanish on occasion, Gore promised that if he is elected president to use the strong economic growth and educational gains of the past six years to increase job opportunities for Hispanics.

"Latino business ownership is at the highest levels, and Latino poverty rates are at the lowest levels," the leading Democratic candidate said during the annual conference of the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials. "We must extend this prosperity to the unskilled and the underprivileged, to our farms, our cities and to our immigrants."

California GOP changes format of primary

ONTARIO, Calif. – California Republican party leaders voted Saturday to change their presidential primary from a "winner-take-all" system to one that would allow multiple candidates to split the state's many delegates.

The party's executive committee voted 52-12 to change the system for California's March 7, 2000 primary. Backers of the change said it would make the candidates focus their campaigns earlier and thus help produce stronger party support for the eventual presidential nominee.

Synagogue fires spark probe across West

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) – Federal agents, from across the West on Saturday hunted for the arsonists who torched three synagogues and caused about $1 million in damages that included the loss of a 5,000-volume library.

There were no arrests or suspects, but investigators said they were examining anti-Jewish fliers found at two of the crime scenes. They said leads were developing from calls coming into a federal hotline.

"It's a wide variety. People who may have heard things, or seen things, or just have tips concerning people they think are involved. So, it's a wide range," said FBI spokesman Nick Rossi.

Jim Adamcik of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, said more than 100 federal agents were involved in the investigation.

Authorities declined to discuss specifics of the investigation. Adamcik said the first firefighters at the scene of two of the burned synagogues found containers that the arsonists may have used to hold fuel or chemicals.

The oldest 'Supreme' is still going strong

ANALYSIS
Richard Carelli

WASHINGTON – Three constants have marked Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens' 24-year tenure: his bow ties, an agile and independent mind, and a seemingly studied disinterest in asserting a leadership role.

Reluctant or not, Stevens was at the helm at key times in the soon-to-end 1998-99 term.

He took the lead and wrote for the court when the justices struck down a Chicago anti-loitering ordinance, limiting how far cities can go to combat street gang crime.

When the court banned California and all other states from paying lower welfare benefits to newcomers than to longtime residents, Stevens wrote the majority opinion.

John Paul Stevens

A lucid, if not inspiring, writer, Stevens wrote a line in the welfare case sure to be among the most memorable of the term that may end this week: "Citizens of the United States, whether rich or poor, have the right to choose to be citizens of the state wherein they reside."

In the street-gang case, the Chicago native said the invalidated law could be invoked against a gang member and his father found loitering near Wrigley Field "whether the reason ... is to rob an unsuspecting fan or just to get a glimpse of Sammy Sosa leaving the ballpark."

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was among the dissenters in both cases, leaving it to the senior justice in the majority to choose who would speak for the court. In both, Stevens tapped himself.

"I'm sure he's pleased to have the opportunity to exercise some influence, but that's really secondary for him," said Daniel Farber, a University of Minnesota law professor who worked as a Stevens law clerk in 1976-77. "He calls them the way he sees them. He's fundamentally not ideological."

Rehnquist, who cast only 10 dissenting votes in each of the past two court terms, already has dissented a dozen times since the current court's term began in October. All 12 times, Stevens sided with the majority and inherited the assignment-making authority. It is not a trivial power, often determining a decision's sweep and emphasis.

When the court ruled that school districts can be sued if officials ignore serious sexual harassment by students against other students, Stevens might have had no choice but to assign Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to write for the 5-4 majority.

While joining four generally more liberal colleagues – Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer – O'Connor seemed determined to erect a hard-to-satisfy standard for liability, one that would not panic school officials nationwide.

Stevens has not adopted a new strategy. At age 79, the court's oldest member shows no sign of sacrificing his intellectual creativity for more clout.

Since Stevens was appointed to the nation's highest court in 1975 by President Gerald R. Ford, he marched to his own drummer and appeared not to care whether anyone followed.

"That which makes a leader on the court is not necessarily intellectual acumen or integrity but an ability to engage in politics with a small 'p' – a willingness to compromise and build a consensus," Northwestern University law professor Lawrence Marshall, a Stevens law clerk in 1986-87, once said of his old boss. "Justice Stevens has always considered his role to be judicial, not political."

Rumors of Stevens' retirement, which swept through Washington after doctors cleared a coronary artery in 1997, still persist. But the justice is giving no hint of stepping down. After all, he's at the top of his game.

Richard Carelli has covered the Supreme Court for The Associated Press since 1976.

Russia blocks adoption of Kosovo rebuilding program

Leaders want help for Serbian people

COLOGNE, Germany (AP) – Russia blocked world leaders Saturday from adopting a Kosovo rebuilding program that excludes Slobodan Milosevic's regime. The leaders held out the possibility of fixing Belgrade's bombed-out power plants and roads for humanitarian reasons.

"One cannot make the Serbian people suffer for their president," German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder said. "One cannot leave them without power in winter or without heat."

Yeltsin, angry over NATO's 78-day bombing campaign against Belgrade, was described as "in a fighting mood." He will arrive here Sunday.

President Clinton, French President Jacques Chirac and British Prime Minister Tony Blair have been the most outspoken in their opposition to assistance for Milosevic. But Sandy Berger, the national security adviser, said the summit's final communique would be silent about banning help for Milosevic because Russia refused to go along.

Berger also said it was an open question whether restoring Belgrade's electricity might be covered by humanitarian aid. A European official said rebuilding roads could be covered.

Meeting in this ancient cathedral city, the presidents and prime ministers of eight nations worked on a plan to ease the burden of $69 billion in Soviet-era debt.

They also were expected to endorse quick resumption of $4.5 billion in Western loans for Moscow that were suspended when Russia's economy collapsed last August.

While the leaders conferred, at least 20,000 people, led by Irish rocker Bono of the band U2, held hands to form a human chain around Cologne. They protested the summit's $100 billion debt-relief plan for poor nations, calling it inadequate.

"We appreciate the absurdity of how it looks, spoiled rock stars on this serious issue," Bono said. He presented a petition to Schroeder, the summit host, and talked directly with British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Meeting in a modernistic art museum, the leaders moved toward approval of Clinton's proposal to increase aid to help Moscow maintain control of its nuclear arsenal.

The United States has pledged $4.2 billion, and Japan has offered $200 million to dismantle nuclear weapons, dispose of plutonium, decommission nuclear submarines and employ Russia's arms scientists in civilian jobs.

Preparing for talks with Yeltsin, Clinton conferred with Russia's new prime minister, Sergei Stepashin. Berger said Stepashin told the president that Kosovo "obviously had put a strain in our relationship" but that "it's important to move beyond" that dispute. Berger said Clinton agreed.

But Yeltsin still appeared angry. He was quoted in a magazine interview as likening the bombing of Yugoslavia as an attempt "to drag us back into the Stone Age."

"In our eyes, an extremely dangerous precedent for solving conflicts has been set," the Russian leader told Der Spiegel. He complained that a "NATO-centered model" of European security ignored Russian interests.

Milosevic tries to keep Serb refugees invisible

KRALJEVO, Yugoslavia (AP) – Bedraggled convoys of tractors pulling wagons crammed with Serb women, children and household goods are a powerful symbol of the Kosovo debacle – one that President Slobodan Milosevic's government is desperate to hide.

An estimated 50,000 people have fled the province since Serb forces pulled out last week. They are camped outside Kosovo in southern Serbia – depressed, desperate and outraged at a government that is scrambling to render them invisible.

"If Milosevic were here, I'd strangle him with my bare hands," Pumsha Rasovic, a 30-year-old factory worker from the Kosovo village of Belica, said Saturday.

"I'd like to go to Belgrade to see Milosevic," said Sejdija Ayazu, a refugee from Istok. "Kosovo helped him rise to power and Kosovo will destroy him."

The government is trying to ignore the exodus while at the same time turn back the tide. The refugees' plight is kept off state television, although the official Tanjug news agency carried a statement by Deputy Prime Minister Milovan Bojic on Saturday urging Serbs to return to Kosovo within 48 hours.

And in a surreal flip-flop, it is trying to turn the reviled "NATO aggressors" into the Serbs' best friends, their guardians and protectors. The commander of the peacekeepers, Lt. Gen. Mike Jackson, has become a fixture on state TV, promising to make the province safe for the Serb minority as well as for returning ethnic Albanians.

For the moment, the Yugoslav government is working mightily to keep the Kosovo Serbs from straying far from the province. Police checkpoints bar them from moving north toward Belgrade. Their care has been left up to local officials and international organizations.

The strategy seems to be to keep them near the Kosovo border in hopes they'll go home before things get out of hand.

Rasovic and his family left Kosovo last week in terror of Kosovo Liberation Army rebels. They made it as far as the police checkpoint in Kraljevo, where they were sent to the trash-strewn parking lot of a nearby warehouse. From there, they were moved into a school along with several hundred other people.

They were the lucky ones. Hundreds more were still in the parking lot, camping in the open, cooking over a fire and sharing a single toilet.

Her lips pursed in anger, Kraljevo's refugee commissioner, Olga Nikovic, described how officials from Belgrade showed up Friday and ordered the city to cancel the construction of a tent camp that could have served as a way station.

A foreign aid group was already on the spot, ready to start, but the plan was nixed. "They don't want to put up tents because they want to deny the dimensions of the refugee problem," Nikovic said.

About 15,000 Kosovo Serbs have arrived over the past week in Kraljevo, 75 miles south of Belgrade. In one four-hour period alone, a convoy of nearly 400 refugee vehicles snaked into this city of 126,000.

Arduous rebuilding effort awaits

Knight Ridder News Service

PEC, Yugoslavia – Up a cobblestone alley lined with torched houses – silent but for the sound of water rushing underground – burned-out cars sit at crazy angles, pointing the way to Nexhije Salihi's door.

The door opens on a small courtyard where Salihi, 72, rests on her porch eating sweet cherries – an oasis of life in a town left for dead.

"The night I came here, you would have thought all Peje was burning," Salihi said, using the Albanian name for Pec, Kosovo's second-largest town. "The army came many times to take the car in front of my door, but they couldn't get it started. They shouted, 'Granny, granny! We're going to burn your house, too!' But God gave me the will to stay."

Across Kosovo, survivors like Salihi are emerging after 11 weeks of horror to find a devastated landscape strewn with charred, roofless houses and the decaying bodies of as many as 10,000 dead. Thousands more are missing, taken prisoner by Serb forces or simply lost in the chaos of the war's early days.

Now, the people of Kosovo must rebuild their lives. So far, most are focused on urgent needs: Food, medicine, burials and the search for news of those lost. But for the international community, the physical destruction of Kosovo by Serb forces and NATO bombs is looming as a new crisis that could leave as many as 250,000 people without homes.

Until March, the Kosovo conflict was primarily a peasants' rebellion against the Yugoslav government. Farms and villages in the rebel heartland were burned, but urban areas were untouched. Today, after nearly three months of shelling and burning – and punishing airstrikes by NATO bombers – broad sections of Kosovo's largest towns simply exist no more.

"I can only compare the damage we're seeing to the Second World War," said Werner Schellenberg, a housing specialist with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, who was shocked when he made an initial survey of the province by helicopter last week.

"We have seen people with their trucks and their belongings standing in front of a rubble pit," Schellenberg said. "This morning I met somebody in Pristina who said he wanted to return to Cegrane (a Macedonian refugee camp), because he did not believe what he found when he returned."

In the hardest-hit places – western towns like Pec and Djakovica along the heavily contested Albanian border – one-third to half of the houses are thought to be uninhabitable, according to the U.N. refugee agency. International relief workers fear that reconstruction in Pec – which sustained the most damage – may not begin until next spring.

That means international aid agencies may have to shift resources away from rebuilding Kosovo and concentrate on erecting tent camps, collection centers and other emergency shelter in the province to keep thousands of people warm and dry during the bitter winter that will begin to descend on Kosovo's hills and high plains in barely four months.

"To intervene in rural areas was easy. But to cope with this level of damage in urban areas is going to be a very, very long-term problem," Schellenberg said.

So far, the UNHCR advance team has been unable to determine how much of the damage was caused by Serbs and how much by NATO.

"That's what I want to find out: what has caused this degree of damage," Schellenberg said.

"It looks like an earthquake," Schellenberg said. "The NATO bombs, they were very precise. But depending where the impact was, you find side effects into the civilian areas."

The extent of the damage varies widely. The southern town of Prizren, for example – where the population was not forcibly expelled until the war's final days – is virtually undamaged. Water runs steadily from taps, electricity is fairly reliable and most homes have semi-regular telephone service.

In the capital city of Pristina, damage is widespread but relatively light. There's no water, but the green market still functions, there's ample electricity and gas stations are still pumping.

In the west, in the shadow of the Cursed Mountains, the scene is far grimmer. Here, Serb forces struck hard and fast, attacking within hours after the first NATO bombs fell March 24. In Djakovica and Pec, entire neighborhoods were torched and hundreds slaughtered as Serb soldiers, police and paramilitaries forced the population out. In the following weeks, large concentrations of Serb forces attracted heavy strikes from NATO bombers.

Now, western towns are virtually cut off from the world by bombed-out bridges and roads sown with Serbian mines. Shock is everywhere; almost everything else is in short supply.

Hundreds of shops were destroyed in Djakovica. In Pec, the central market is an eerie ruin of collapsed walls and iron lampposts dripping melted glass. People live on bread, crushed red peppers and beans. Coffee is a prize, sugar a dream, gas a trickle. Women walk through town complaining they have no soap: It is a luxury just to be clean.

"Before we can do anything we must heal our souls from this tragedy," said Esat Hana, a language professor sipping Turkish coffee with friends among Djakovica's rubble. "Now we are coming out of death's shadow, and it will take awhile."

Waiting with his mother for transportation home, an ethnic Albanian refugee boy sits by his family's packed bags and flashes a victory sign as a NATO helicopter passes over the refugee camp in Macedonia. Kosovar refugees now face a daunting task of regaining a sense of normalcy in their lives.

NATO escalates gun confiscations

The Washington Post

UROSEVAC, Yugoslavia – With the last Yugoslav military troops scheduled to depart Kosovo today, NATO forces are preparing to escalate the disarming of ethnic Albanian guerrillas who are taking over increasing police and governmental roles, often including violence and intimidation of rival Serbian communities.

U.S. forces, which include the Marines and the 82nd Airborne Division, have been the most aggressive of the NATO troops in stripping KLA members of their weapons, arresting recalcitrant rebels and interceding in incidents of violence and threats against Serbs.

Blue Angels cope with relationship problems

PENSACOLA, Fla. (AP) – The commander of the Blue Angels investigated and found nothing to a rumor that one of his pilots was having an affair with a female officer in the Navy's precision flying squadron.

But that was not the end of the story in this time of heightened sensitivity about male-female relationships in the military.

On June 8, both officers still ended up being removed from the team, based at Pensacola Naval Air Station.

They were reassigned for disobeying written and verbal orders to avoid contact, to avoid any perception that something inappropriate was going on, according to a Navy official who did not want to be identified.

Their "personal relationship" involved non-sexual activities such as jogging and working out together, the official said.

"I'm hearing about more and more of these no-contact orders," said Eugene R. Fidell, a civilian lawyer and president of the National Institute of Military Justice, a private informational and educational group.

"What it says is 'avoid problems,' " Fidell said in a telephone interview from his Washington office Thursday. "Such an order is a shot across the bow."

Military commanders are trying to avoid such highly publicized situations as the resignation of 1st Lt. Kelly Flinn, the Air Force's first female B-52 pilot, and the Navy's Tailhook scandal, Fidell said.

The pilots from the U.S. Navy's Blue Angels perform a 'walkdown' as they prepare to board their F/A-18 Hornets before a practice run of their aerobatic routine above the Flathead Valley near Kalispell, Mont., Thursday.

The Air Force let Flinn resign in 1997, relenting on plans for a court-martial that could have meant a prison term, after she disobeyed orders to end an affair with an enlisted woman's husband.

"Commanders are getting proactive on this," Fidell said.

But commanders risk crossing a line that separates rights of personal association and the need to maintain good military order.

"There is still a lot of confusion where the lines are," said Frank Spinner, the Fairfax, Va., lawyer who represented Ms. Flinn. "It's not a healthy environment at all."

In the Blue Angels case, a news release announcing the reassignments said only that Marine Maj. Scott Wedemeyer, a married pilot, and Navy Lt. Tanya Wallace, a public-affairs officer who is single, had been removed "due to a loss of trust and confidence" and for safety reasons "to ensure that squadron personnel are not distracted."

CHANDLER, Ariz. (AP) – A police dog escaped from a squad car and mauled an innocent pregnant woman during a drunken-driving arrest.

The attack came last week as Isabel Ford was leaving a dance recital with her husband, mother-in-law and 4-year-old daughter.

While crossing the street, she saw officers running toward a DUI suspect who had become combative.

As Officer Dennis Newman joined the pursuit, his police dog, Rex, escaped. Instead of helping the officers, the Belgian Malinois knocked Ford to the ground and bit her repeatedly.

"It was certainly the most terrifying thing I've ever been through," Ford said. "The dog was relentless. My husband is the hero. I'd be dead without him."

Terrance Ford punched and kicked the dog until Newman could bring it under control.

Mrs. Ford suffered wounds to her buttocks, hip and arm that required 30 stitches. Doctors assured Ford that her baby was not injured.

"Our sincerest apologies. I know the city of Chandler will do what's necessary to help this woman," said Police Chief Bobby Joe Harris.

Harris said the dog will be taken off the streets pending an investigation.

A police report said Newman's cruiser had been hit by another squad car while he was halting the suspect motorist. The dog ran free when Newman ran to assist in the arrest.

"These dogs inherently are protective of their patrol car," Harris said. "When that car got bumped, I'm sure that set the animal off."

Doctors save baby with surgical first

Group opens uterus, performs brain surgery

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) – Sleeping in his mother's cradled arms, Neal Borkowski appears to be a typical baby, developing like most five-week-olds.

But little Neal may owe his normalcy – and his life – to an amazing procedure performed on him even before his birth.

In what is believed to be a surgical first, doctors opened his mother's uterus two months before Neal was born and performed surgery to relieve a buildup of water on the brain, a condition that leaves one in every 2,000 babies severely brain-damaged.

Surgeons Dr. Joseph Bruner and Dr. Noel Tulipan said Friday at Vanderbilt University Medical Center they have used the procedure 49 times over the past two years to repair spina bifida lesions in the womb. But they said the March 2 surgery was the first time the procedure was used on the brain.

They acknowledge they won't know for six months to a year – until they can measure Borkowski's IQ – whether he suffered any serious brain damage from the condition, known as congenital hydrocephalus. But the fact that he was born May 12 without excess fluid on the brain makes the surgery a success, they said.

"We really have to hedge our bets as to how he'll do over the long run," Tulipan said.

The baby's mother, Susan Borkowski of Knoxville, Tenn., said she learned during a routine ultrasound that her 20-week-old fetus had hydrocephalus.

AP photos

Having lost a brother to hydrocephalus shortly after his birth, going ahead with the experimental surgery "wasn't really a decision," she said.

In the procedure, Mrs. Borkowski's uterus was opened by Bruner before Tulipan made an incision in the fetus' skull and placed a shunt, or small tube, in the fluid space of the brain.

The opposite end of the shunt was hooked to a small valve controlling the flow of fluid.

The valve was connected to another long, thin tube that was tunneled out through the fetus' skin between the shoulder blades, and the fluid drained into the amniotic fluid in Mrs. Borkowski's uterus.

Neal was delivered by Caesarean section five weeks early, weighing 4 pounds, 7 ounces.

A second surgery was performed to exchange the tube for a shunt draining the fluid into his abdominal cavity.

Therapists: Now, help for those with road rage

The Associated Press

So you're driving 10 mph over the speed limit but you slow down when a tailgater starts honking. Very passive-aggressive.

Or, you speed up when someone tries to pass you. Classic competitive behavior.

Or you scream and pound your steering wheel when construction limits traffic to one lane. Narcissistic personality.

Donald Einreinhofer has been diagnosing the personality types behind raging drivers' worst habits for a year, listening – for $70 an hour – as motorists vent their frustrations.

The 31-year-old high school teacher – a certified hypnotherapist but not trained as a psychologist – began advertising road rage counseling after he couldn't find anyone to help with his own traffic-related problems.

"It's kind of made me a one-man specialty," said Einreinhofer, who offers hourly sessions out of his home in rural Stockholm, N.J.

More than 30 people have paid for one-on-one sessions, and he counsels many others at seminars and one-day classes.

Einreinhofer says passive-aggressive motorists don't start out antagonizing other drivers, but won't tolerate anyone else they feel is a dangerous driver.

"There's a lot of people who come in with a real law-and-order mentality," Einreinhofer said. "Somehow they feel a compulsion to punish that person."

Einreinhofer says he used to be a passive aggressor, and his pet peeve was tailgating. Now, he uses hypnosis and muscle relaxation exercises to calm down.

Vouchers make positive impact in Milwaukee schools

Knight Ridder News Service

MILWAUKEE – Things are all stirred up in the city that school-choice advocates – and opponents – have watched closely since 1990, when tuition vouchers were first issued to low-income families here.

For instance: The Bruce-Guadeloupe Community School, a voucher school that is the pride of its struggling Hispanic community, has acquired a new partner – the city school system.

> 'This school is turning around. It's starting to be a neighborhood school again.'
> – Jackie Regnier, parent

For instance: A showcase public school known as the Congress Year-Round School, the joy of its neighborhood, wants to loosen bureaucratic reins and become a charter school.

For instance: Classrooms in some parochial schools that were half-empty a year ago now are nearly full – as are the school coffers, brimming with $4,950 voucher checks.

And this month the new city schools superintendent, Spence Korte, and Milwaukee Archbishop Rembert Weakland pledged to work together, in Korte's words, "to create the best all-around school system in America that works for all children – public, private and parochial."

The Milwaukee voucher plan has survived major legal hurdles and the wrath of its opponents. But even after a decade, tuition vouchers remain the subject of intense scrutiny and debate in education circles.

Issues include whether the public schools have been harmed as state aid is siphoned off to vouchers; whether private schools steer hard-to-educate children back to the public schools; whether private schools should have to disclose financial and testing data; and whether Wisconsin taxpayers would balk if the vouchers were expanded statewide.

Meanwhile, the Milwaukee public schools are in the thick of reform and renewal – from $200 million proposed for new-school construction in the city to a state-financed small-class-size initiative in high-poverty schools in the city and across Wisconsin.

At the Congress Year-Round Elementary School, parents not only praise the long school year, the school-uniform option, inclusion of special-needs children and early childhood programming, they want more: their hope is that the district will build a middle school on the schoolgrounds.

"This school is turning around. It's starting to be a neighborhood school again," said parent Jackie Regnier. "I love this school. Otherwise, my kids wouldn't be here, that is for sure."

The reforms represent best practices in education as identified by research – not in reaction to any threat from the voucher movement, said Mary Beth Minkley, principal at Year-Round. "I wanted to make this the most desirable school in the city," said Minkley.

These days, strains between public-school defenders and voucher advocates are being played down.

With the aim of helping city children thrive, the district and the archdiocese agreed to develop before- and after-school programs for children, recruit and train school volunteers, improve education services for children with special needs or limited English proficiency, and seek to share burdens and resources such as staff development and technology education.

The Wisconsin Supreme Court last summer ruled that vouchers could be spent for religious school tuition. Soon afterward, the U.S. Supreme Court declined to hear an appeal.

The voucher program immediately expanded almost fourfold, to 6,000 this past year from 1,600 in 1997-98, with Milwaukee's Catholic schools a prime beneficiary. Enrollment in some schools doubled and the influx of vouchers has lifted the schools out of dire financial straits, according to Jerry Topczewski, archdiocese spokesman.

The voucher rules require private schools accepting vouchers to declare how many slots they have for "choice" students, then use a lottery if there are more applicants than slots.

The schools cannot use criteria such as grades or tests to turn away a voucher student but can use what could be described as friendly persuasion.

What the private schools gain financially, the Milwaukee public schools lose. The state pays an amount equal to the per pupil aid it offers the district, then subtracts that from the aid going to the city system. The net loss to the school system last year was about $25.6 million.

There are 103,000 children enrolled in Milwaukee public schools. Last year's overall budget was $934 million.

Riders honor 'freedom rides' of '60s

Knight Ridder News Service

GREENSBORO, N.C. – They are the "freedom riders" of a different time, most born years after the first buses of civil rights workers roared into the storm to test desegregated interstate facilities in the South.

The earlier riders of 1961 – blacks and whites, members of the Congress of Racial Equality – started south from Washington with a destination of New Orleans. The so-called freedom rides would be CORE's most visible event to focus attention on the struggle for equal rights, until three CORE workers – two white and one black – were murdered by Klan members in Mississippi in June 1964.

Last week, 3 1/2 decades later, buses of new freedom riders started from New York with a destination of Philadelphia, Miss., near where the three activists, James Chaney of Meridian, Miss., and Michael Schwerner and Andrew Goodman, both from the New York City area, were found buried in an earthen dam.

The new freedom riders stopped in Greensboro for lunch and a program in the city that gave birth to the movement's sit-ins. They left with 16 more riders, most of them college students.

Monday, on the 35th anniversary of the murders that brought so much attention to the movement, they will stand at James Earl Chaney's grave in Meridian, Miss., and try to understand what he and the other two faced in another time, another era.

The three were among 175 activists registering black voters in Mississippi. They were arrested for speeding and shortly after their release they were reported missing. Two months later, their bodies were found.

"This is an opportunity for some of us to actually see what happened during the movement," said Chad McMurray, 20, a Greensboro native and junior at Appalachian State University. "We will physically feel what it's like to make a journey and go to someplace different and try to help people make a change.

"These people risked their lives and everything they had to bring attention that made people think about what they were doing to others. They helped bring a stop to it. They pioneered positive change for America."

The freedom rides of 1999 are sponsored by the Chaney Goodman Unity Coalition, a foundation dedicated the memory of the three slain workers and run by Chaney's younger brother, Ben. The idea is to give a new generation a sense of the struggle for change. "We will try to re-create the intensity of the '60s," said Ben Chaney, 47, who was 12 when his brother was murdered. "That was a very intense period, and we want to introduce to young people who were not around what it was like, the dangers, the triumphs."

They will stop at sites important to the movement and speak with people who played major roles.

Ultimately, 200 riders from 40 states will gather in Mississippi. They will take stones from their hometowns to build a memorial at Chaney's grave site, repeatedly vandalized over the last 35 years. They will hold a service at a Philadelphia church burned – and later rebuilt – the day of the murders. They'll sit and work on legislative issues still important to civil right, such as police brutality, profiling and gun control.

No one has ever been charged with the three murders. Chaney has spent years urging Mississippi officials to reopen the case. Several people were convicted or pleaded guilty to violating their civil rights.

He hopes the ride will refocus attention on that event and other issues. "It rededicates the fact that three young men lost their lives so that everybody can take part in this democracy," Chaney said. "For me, it is an opportunity to let the country see that young people are still active. This is a serious effort to empower youth across America to decide on certain legislative issues that affect them directly."

Indian prime minister declines mediation

NEW DELHI, India – India's prime minister ruled out international mediation Saturday to end fighting in the disputed region of Kashmir, where his troops are fighting guerrillas India says are backed by Pakistan.

The rejection came after Pakistani Prime Minister Nawaz Sherif asked the leaders of the Group of Eight, the richest industrial nations and Russia, on Friday to "avert a conflict" by taking a role in resolving the dispute.

India's Atal Bihari Vajpayee responded Saturday, telling reporters: "We respect the international goodwill shown toward us ... (but) there is no need for any mediation. It is a bilateral issue, and we will resolve it."

Pakistan denies any connection to the Islamic guerrillas. India has been battling the rebels for the last month to dislodge from mountain positions in the Indian-controlled part of the Himalayan region of Kashmir.

India accuses Pakistan of backing the guerrillas in a bid to change the cease-fire line that divides Kashmir between the two countries. They have fought two wars over the territory since 1947.

North, South Korea to participate in talks

SEOUL, South Korea – North Korea told the South Saturday that it will take part in talks between the rival Koreas despite a naval clash between them last week that sank one northern gunboat, officials in Seoul said.

But Monday's meeting in Beijing – the first government contact between the two Koreas in 14 months – could face difficulties because the North might raise the issue of the naval clash in a contested area in the Yellow Sea. The talks were originally expected to focus on food aid for hunger-stricken North and the reunion of millions of separated family members in the divided Korean peninsula.

North Korea assured Seoul it would send a delegation for the talks in a message it sent through South Korea's Red Cross office in Panmunjom, inside the demilitarized zone between the two Koreas, the South's Ministry of Unification said.

The exchange of fire occurred Tuesday when South Korean naval boats tried to ram and nudge North Korean ships out of a buffer zone that has served as a practical maritime border between the two sides since the end of the three-year Korean War in 1953. The area is a rich crab fishing ground.

Since then, tensions have greatly subsided.

Suu Kyi asks women to fight for democracy

BANGKOK, Thailand – Embattled opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi encouraged Myanmar women to fight for democracy in a statement released Saturday on Women of Burma Day, an unofficial holiday that coincides with the activist's birthday.

"There is a great need for our women of Burma to use their capabilities to bring democracy and human rights to our country," Suu Kyi said in her statement, which was received in Bangkok.

Although not recognized as a national holiday, Women of Burma Day was created by Suu Kyi's supporters as a way to celebrate the struggles and achievements of the country's women.

Myanmar, which has been ruled by the military since 1962, is also known as Burma. Suu Kyi, the 1991 Nobel Peace Prize winner, spent six years under house arrest from 1989-95 for her role in trying to restore democracy to the Southeast Asian nation.

Suu Kyi delivered her statement Friday to members of her political party, the National League for Democracy, at its headquarters in Myanmar's capital, Yangon.

"It is no longer possible even for housewives to keep out of politics, because politics has invaded the traditional domain of housewives," Suu Kyi said. "The root cause of upward spiraling commodity prices, greatly increased charges for electricity and rising costs of education and health care is a political one."

Poles know there won't be another like 'our pope'

KRAKOW, Poland – Huddled under a sea of umbrellas at a rain-soaked Mass this week, Poland's Catholic faithful got a glimpse of the future.

In the papal throne sat Cardinal Angelo Sodano, the Vatican secretary of state, filling in for ailing Pope John Paul II. When it came time for the papal homily, though, Krakow's archbishop read the words 1 million people gathered to hear because Sodano, an Italian, lacked a sufficient command of Polish.

No one seemed to mind too much, but the moment showed exactly how much this nation that ties its heritage to its Roman Catholic faith will lose when history's only Polish pope is gone.

The flu that forced John Paul to miss the Mass in his former diocese reinforced awareness of his frailty at 79, stooped and shaking from what is suspected to be Parkinson's disease.

His successor, and Sodano is considered a candidate, will come from another country, ending the unique status that Poles embraced since the surprising ascension of former Krakow Archbishop Karol Wojtyla in 1978.

Zany British political wannabe is found dead

LONDON – Screaming Lord Sutch, founder of Britain's irreverent Monster Raving Loony Party and his country's longest-serving political leader, has died.

He was 58 and was found dead Wednesday at his London home, an apparent suicide by hanging.

Sutch, who founded the Loony Party in 1963, was said to have suffered for years from depression, a condition that grew worse after the recent deaths of his mother and his dog.

He also was distressed by the Loonies' inability to afford the $7,500 deposit to run candidates in last week's European Parliament elections, pronouncing the situation "a bad day for Loonies ... a sad day for democracy."

Sutch was responsible for British candidates' stiff rise in registration fees – perhaps his major accomplishment in more than three decades of adding merriment to the British political scene. He never won, but he was never dull. He could ask the pointed question, such as "Why is there only one Monopolies Commission?" He was a font of proposals: Joggers and the unemployed should be forced to power a gigantic treadmill to generate cheap electricity. January and February should be banned to shorten winter. Fish should be bred in a European wine lake so they can be caught already pickled.

Prince Edward marries at Windsor Castle

WINDSOR, England (AP) – Prince Edward married Sophie Rhys-Jones in the regal splendor of Windsor Castle Saturday, bouyed by the good wishes of thousands who lined the streets to cheer the wedding of the youngest son of Queen Elizabeth II.

Solemn and intense as she entered the chapel, the bride broke into a broad smile while making her vow.

Though more modest than the weddings of Edward's brothers and sister, which all ended in divorce, it was a splendid occasion nonetheless. The congregation inside St. George's Chapel was studded with royalty – including cousins from Europe – who were invited as family, not as state visitors.

The bride wore an ivory hand-dyed silk organza paneled coat and corseted, V-neck dress strewn with 325,000 cut-glass and pearl beads, hand-dyed ivory tulle train. She wore a diamond tiara and black and white pearl necklace and earrings designed for her by Edward.

In a message dispatched from Cologne, Germany, where he is attending a summit of the world's leading industrial nations, Prime Minister Tony Blair told the couple they have "the support of the whole country."

"I'm sure they will be tremendously happy," Blair said.

Hours before the wedding, the queen made her son the Earl of Wessex and Viscount Severn – not a duke as some had expected. His bride will be the Countess Wessex. Edward eventually will inherit the title of Duke of Edinburgh, now held by his father, Prince Philip, Buckingham Palace announced.

Well-wishers, some clutching red, white and blue Union Jack flags, gathered in Windsor to see the youngest son of Queen Elizabeth II and his bride at St. George's Chapel, within the precincts of Windsor Castle. A few had camped outdoors overnight to secure good positions along the wedding route.

Edward, who has watched the very public disintegration of his brothers' and sister's marriages, originally intended to keep his own wedding small and private. But as interest grew, arrangements were made to broadcast the service.

The prince and his 34-year-old bride, a middle-class public relations executive, have known each other for six years.

In a TV interview during his last hours of bachelorhood, the 35-year-old prince – a television producer – said love was "the most important thing of all" in the match.

Asked what qualities made the relationship work, he said they shared many common interests.

"We can help each other and understand each other and support each other, which is what we have done for the last few years," he told Independent Television News.

"We manage to have a good laugh about things most of the time, and we happen to love each other, which is the most important thing of all," he said.

Prince Edward, the youngest son of Britain's Queen Elizabeth II, and his bride, Sophie Rhys-Jones, leave St. George's Chapel in Windsor Castle, after their marriage Saturday.

Prince Charles and Prince Andrew were Edward's "supporters" – the royal equivalent of best men. Charles' sons, Prince William and Prince Harry, and Andrew's daughters, Princess Beatrice and Princess Eugenie, were also there. Andrew's ex-wife, Sarah, was not invited.

The whole royal family attended, led by the queen and her husband; their daughter, Princess Anne, and her second husband, Royal Navy Cmdr. Timothy Laurence; Anne's children from her first marriage, Peter and Zara Phillips; the 98-year-old Queen Mother Elizabeth and Princess Margaret, the queen's sister.

More than 6,000 people were invited to stand in prime positions outside to watch the guests arrive.

The new royal couple will take a brief carriage ride through town immediately after the wedding before returning to the castle for the reception and dinner.

Indicating the type of gifts the couple can expect, the Australian government said Saturday its wedding offering is a set of timber panels inlaid with pictures of Australia's flora and fauna by New South Wales artist Michael Retter.

TWIN FALLS CENTURY PLAN

Twin Falls' 2nd Century is almost here. Looking back we can see the gains and losses that have come with growth and past decisions. Looking ahead, we can imagine a future shaped by the choices we make now. Only through thoughtful planning and consistent decisions about our future will we build a better community.

The first step in planning for the development and redevelopment of our community was to create and agree on a Vision for our future. The next step is to draft a plan that outlines the step by step approach to achieving our Vision. The plan will answer questions like "How do we do it? and "What will it look like"? The plan will build on the existing features and attributes that have shaped Twin Falls. The Plan will manage growth and change in Twin Falls well into our next Century, and be a practical guide for making decisions on specific land use issues and development. The Plan will also establish priorities for transportation, capital improvements, parks and recreation, and other public services.

The Plan is being developed using a series of logical steps. Starting with the broad Vision that defines our desired future, the plan will detail a variety of recommended actions, which together will turn our dreams into reality.

The 2nd Century Vision...from our dreams to actions

NEW GATEWAYS

ATTRACTIVE COMMUNITY

In the 2nd Century, Twin Falls will... be an attractive and uniquely identifiable community through thoughtful design and enhancement of the community's civic buildings, public places, gateways, streets, and residential and commercial development.

POSSIBLE ACTIONS

- Demonstrate local values by promoting site-specific commercial building designs that reflect the city's individual character and maintain its unique appearance
- Construct city arterials as tree-lined boulevards with landscaped medians and sidewalks that are separated from the street
- Prioritize urban design and streetscape improvements which create attractive entrances and guide visitors to key places in Twin Falls, such as Old Town and Shoshone Falls
- Locate civic facilities such as community buildings, government offices, recreation centers and schools in central locations as highly visible focal points. Their quality shall express permanence, importance and respect for community identity

GREAT NEIGHBORHOODS

In the 2nd Century, Twin Falls will... be a community of safe, friendly, interactive and cohesive residential neighborhoods, which incorporate open space, parks, trails and other recreational amenities.

POSSIBLE ACTIONS

- Encourage street widths to be as narrow as possible to provide a desirable residential environment, discourage excessive speeding and cut-through traffic
- Provide each neighborhood with parks, open spaces and gathering places within walking distance (1/3 mile) of all homes
- Plan neighborhoods to include neighborhood-serving uses, such as grocery stores, professional offices, clinics, churches and small businesses
- Encourage community-wide distribution of affordable or lower cost housing to promote diverse neighborhoods
- Require new development to provide community facilities and assist in the enhancement of existing facilities to help meet the community's quality of life objectives while being cautious to balance those objectives with the cost of development and affordability of housing

TRANSPORTATION CHOICES

In the 2nd Century, Twin Falls will... offer transportation choices that serve the needs of pedestrians, bicyclists, commuters, visitors, and industry, and provide convenient, safe, and efficient connections between residential neighborhoods, commercial areas and employment centers.

POSSIBLE ACTIONS

- Designate a network of preferred streets for bicycle routes and establish bike lanes where necessary, to provide for safe travel throughout the community
- Plan for the future installation of landscaped medians on Blue Lakes Boulevard as properties are developed by aligning and reducing the number of street accesses, and by connecting parking lots to allow for shared use and internal movement
- Build or improve alternative routes to reduce traffic on Blue Lakes Blvd. and provide easier access to important community facilities and US 30, SH 74 and US 93.

INTEGRATED PARKS AND TRAILS

In the 2nd Century, Twin Falls will... provide an integrated and connected system of parks, trails, bike paths, sidewalks and open spaces that enhance the quality of life for residents and support our unique identity and enhance our sense of pride.

POSSIBLE ACTIONS

- Parks should be designed or renovated to be a functional and purposeful part of a neighborhood, not just residual land
- Complete the Canyon Rim Trail to Shoshone Falls Park
- Connect the community's parks and the canyon rims to an integrated system of sidewalks, trails and bike routes
- Acquire or manage open spaces and/or development rights for preservation of canyon land areas and wildlife habitat

HARRISON PARK IMPROVEMENTS

DIVERSE ECONOMY

In the 2nd Century, Twin Falls will... support a diverse and stable economy and employment base that recognizes and capitalizes on our opportunities to attract new industry and establishes our community's niche in the growing tourism industry.

POSSIBLE ACTIONS

- Establish a fair and efficient system of fees and development requirements that assess the costs and benefits of financing public facilities and services to serve new development
- Identify and preserve in advance, key undeveloped industrial and business park parcels in the City to provide future sites for basic industry and high tech employers
- Acquire and market strategic parcels for redevelopment, particularly in Downtown and Old Town to help create and respond to new employment opportunities

STRONG DOWNTOWN

In the 2nd Century, Twin Falls will... have a strong downtown area at the core of our community that encourages interaction between citizens, retains our "small town" feeling, and helps us maintain the spirit and friendliness that makes Twin a great community to live, raise children, and work.

POSSIBLE ACTIONS

- Increase the number, diversity and clustering of public and private entertainment facilities in the downtown area, such as a new performing arts center, open air amphitheater, stages, and cinemas to support more "after hours" activities
- Support the location of new regional and community-wide recreational facilities such as ball fields, ice arena, tennis facilities, natatorium and sports complexes to help increase activity in Old Town and Downtown
- Give preferential consideration to development and redevelopment in the Downtown and Old Town areas before expanding infrastructure (e.g., water, sewer, and streets) to serve new commercial and industrial areas.

EDITORIAL

Freight center represents economic opportunities

Most groundbreakings are purely ceremonial occasions with limited significance. The dignitaries stab the ground with dainty shovels, have their pictures taken, and then get out of the way so the hard hats can start the real work.

The intermodal center is a promising nugget of sophisticated business development for the Magic Valley. As a loading and off-loading site for trucks and trains, the center could become a valuable portal between our local economy and the world.

A community cannot prosper by selling itself sportswear and espresso. A local economy needs a foundation of productive (rather than distributive) enterprises.

Agricultural and industrial producers will be able to send short-haul trucks to the intermodal center, where containers will be shifted to rail cars for long-distance transport. That will help make local producers more competitive in national and world markets.

Though the center's location raised the objections of a few neighbors, it is otherwise correctly sited. Sitting just south of Kimberly Road at 3200 East, it offers convenient access from Twin Falls, from the Hansen Bridge and from the south-end industrial areas.

The intermodal center also encourages new manufacturing development in southeast Twin Falls. Industrial land around the center stands ready to become a privately developed industrial park, providing new jobs and diversification for the local economy. That vision is primarily due to site developer Todd Blass.

Another significant aspect of the groundbreaking was the announcement that Independent Meat would build a shipping center as part of the intermodal complex. The local meatpacker is one of Twin Falls' better employers in terms of pay, benefits and long-term job creation, and the new facility reaffirms the company's commitment to this community.

Independent Meat has been involved in various recent discussions about hog farm development in southern Idaho, and it's clear that the company had choices in its expansion. Keeping this growing company and its jobs in Twin Falls is a worthy goal. Local business leaders have identified retention and growth of existing employers as a key objective in economic development, and Independent Meat is a juicy prize. The community owes its president, Pat Florence, a nod for his determination.

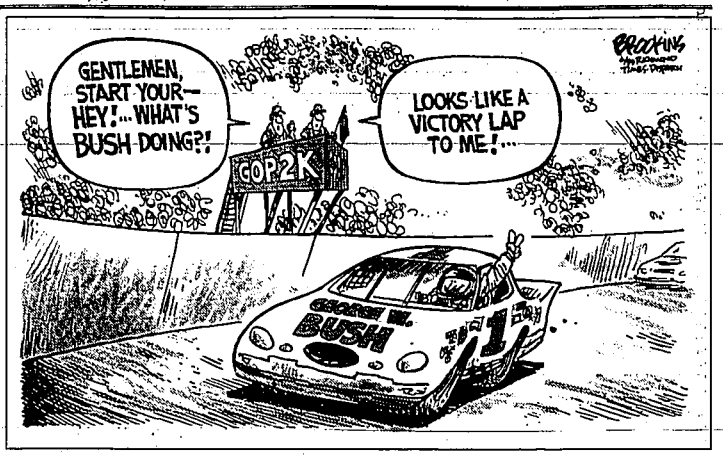
Thirdly, Independent Meat's construction plans underscore the sometimes-overlooked importance of agriculture and ag processing in the local economy.

The retail explosion in Twin Falls has received a lot of attention, and it certainly is an important sector. But a community cannot prosper by selling itself sportswear and boutique-bar espresso. Nor will it prosper while city officials cynically promote manufacturing in name, while undermining real growth by trying to run off and prevent real business opportunities.

A local economy needs a foundation of productive (rather than distributive) enterprises, and in the Magic Valley, that foundation will be agriculture for the foreseeable future.

(Elsewhere on this page is a draft position paper on agricultural rules, written by an ad hoc Twin Falls Area Chamber of Commerce committee. It reflects a common-sense attitude toward agriculture's place in the local economy.)

Both the intermodal center and Independent Meat stand to be important building blocks of local prosperity as the 21st century opens. Blass and Florence can feel justifiably proud of what last week's spadework represents.



Majority may soon grow up without Dad

DIANNA THOMPSON AND STUART MILLER

Today is the next-to-last Father's Day of the millennium. It is an important time for us to reflect on the history and future of fatherhood.

Traditionally, Father's Day is a day that you honored your father for his unconditional love for you through good and bad times – for always being there emotionally, physically and financially. Dad was the one who taught you how to tie your shoes, to ride a bicycle, to catch a fish, to read – memories to cherish for a lifetime.

But sociology professor David Popenoe, author of "Life Without Father," points out that "if present trends continue, the percentage of American children living apart from their biological fathers will reach 50 percent early in the next century."

The U.S. Census Bureau reported that in 1960, 20 percent of all marriages ended in divorce; in 1990, nearly half of all marriages ended in divorce. Even more alarming is the research that shows that children who grow up without fathers are more at risk for social pathologies such as dropping out of school, teen pregnancies, violent behavior, and suicide.

Society has changed considerably in the past 40 years. Women are in the workforce as never before, and men are increasingly taking more active roles in childrearing. But our family courts haven't seemed to notice these societal changes, particularly with regard to custody decisions. Instead, they adhere to an outdated, 1950s vision of the family, which identifies Mom as the "real" (e.g., custodial) parent and Dad as merely the source of financial support (e.g., the non-custodial parent or "visitor").

Court is where one would expect to find equity. Yet the courts are where most divorced fathers discover that they have lost their rights to their children. This is particularly difficult on fathers who shared in parental responsibilities during marriage. Nothing impacts a divorcing father as deeply as hearing a judge relegate the him from model father and citizen to visitor.

Fathers' advocacy groups report that most fathers want to have "shared parenting" or "joint custody" arrangements following divorce; but are astounded to find out that they would have a better chance of winning the lottery. To add insult to injury, many of these same fathers complain that their ex-spouses interfere with their court-ordered visitation. Sometimes access to the children is denied altogether – with no relief from the court.

In contrast to government's involvement in child-support problems, there are no state agencies a father can go to when his visitation is denied. If you are a mother and you don't get your court-ordered child support, state agencies will go after the father and get the money. If you are a father who is experiencing difficulty seeing your children, expect no help.

Many fathers thus become "Dead-bolted Dads." Though more and more child-development experts are recognizing that this "dead-bolting" is a form of child abuse, judges remain reluctant to grant relief.

According to Drs. Joan Berlin Kelley and Judith Wallerstein in their book "Surviving the Breakup," more than half of mothers reported they saw no reason for their children to continue to have any contact with their father. The Children's Right Council, a Washington, D.C.-based advocacy group, estimates that 5,600,000 children have their access to their non-custodial parent sabotaged by the custodial parent.

Society deplores father absence, yet what is being done to encourage father involvement? When the courts make Dad a weekend visitor, do nothing to protect the rights of fathers who have continual visitation problems, and work with agencies that seem only to be concerned about money, are they helping children? Or harming them?

Child support should be a financial, physical and emotional commitment, the same sort that fathers have made to their children throughout history.

The government will use millions of taxpayer dollars to ensure that a child-support check will be at Mom's on Father's Day, but won't lift a finger to see that the father is there. Can a child-support check teach a child how to ride a bike? Can it say, "I Love You"?

Rather than demote fathers to visitors and quickly label them "dead-beat dads," we need to start the new millennium by letting policy-makers know that we as a society will no longer tolerate the government discarding children's fathers, that we value fathers and that Father's Day is really every day for millions of children who need their dads.

Twin Falls chamber details position on valley agriculture

About this statement

This statement was drafted by an ad hoc committee of the Twin Falls Area Chamber of Commerce. The chamber's board of directors is scheduled to consider adopting it as chamber policy next month.

TWIN FALLS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The chamber of commerce recognizes the positive economic contribution of agriculture and agriculture processing to the Magic Valley and encourages the responsible development of both. Further, that the people and businesses in our community have a responsibility to future generations to provide a viable economic base and a clean environment. As such, Twin Falls Chamber of Commerce supports the development of agricultural rules and regulations that:

1) Protect Idaho agricultural operations as defined by the Idaho Right to Farm Act including ag processing.

2) Protect the long term agricultural economic base;

3) Mandate reasonable stewardship of the environment - particularly surface water quality and protection from ground water contamination;

4) Are promulgated by the state Department of Agriculture

5) Are based on "best management practices" and contemporary technical and scientific based methods.

Twin Falls Chamber of Commerce supports scientific based efforts that include industry, allied groups, community members, and the Legislature that lead to determining the best practices to balance farming and processing for competitive production with the reduction of their collective footprint on the environment.

Regulations must be written by a collaborative body including regulators (such as the DEQ) and industry members with the assistance of allied groups such as the Idaho Geological Survey and the University of Idaho. The listed groups' input provides scientific base for matters such as site rules and soil analysis so that land intended for agricultural use can be managed appropriately for underlying geology and practices can be identified and mandated that maintain soil integrity and protects water from contamination.

The enforcement of such legislation falls on the appropriate regulatory body as defined by code established in House Bill 747. The department responsible for enforcement (DEQ and/or Idaho Department of Agriculture) must be adequately funded for on-site visits by staff. The goal of this effort must be to establish preventative measures and allows for adequate monitoring to support agricultural industry's compliance with reasonable rules and regulations.

As instances are identified where compliance is not voluntary, regulatory bodies can take appropriate action in the local county court system or impose fines as currently mandated by regulations. The goal of future legislation must be to encourage industry members to be reasonable stewards of the environment, to comply with practices that protect the environment and yet build our economic base. Members of industry that do not or cannot comply hurt their respective industry, the environment, and, lend themselves to future economic disadvantage of the community.

We recommend that in developing rules and policies that the regulatory bodies should resist the urge to a) define "industrial farms" and b) divide agriculture into different segments. If rules are responsibly developed then they should apply to all ag businesses.

Reward yourself with these books this summer

MOLLY IVINS

Summer Reading List! O, what a treasure-trove of fun and joy and wisdom and knowledge and compassion. I wasn't going to mention Annie Proulx's "Close Range: Wyoming Stories," published by Scribner, since it's already been featured on lots of summer lists. But it's just so good that I can't leave it out.

A new fave, more or less in the murder-mystery category, is Bill Fitzhugh, a seriously funny guy from Northern California published by Avon. "Pest Control," which came out in '97, is a droll story about an environmentally correct bug exterminator who gets mistaken for a professional hit man. His new one, "The Organ Grinders," is hilarious, but it can also make you gasp with horror; it's based on the obvious premise that rich Americans in need of various body parts will be buying them from poor people in foreign countries. The environmental stuff is terrific, and the humor is completely off the wall.

Next, a trio of wonderful books by three exceptional female writers. As it happens, I know all three, but what makes this a trio is that none of these books got the attention it so clearly merits.

One of the saddest developments in book publishing is the blockbuster mentality: all attention to the new book by the Brand Name Author – John Grisham or Danielle Steele – and practically none to books of far greater merit that are unlikely to attract so wide an audience. I know this is a perennial complaint by authors, but the problem becomes more aggravated and aggravating every year.

We can find great shelves full of tripe in the bookstores about "Spirituality" – whatever that means anymore – and "Self-Help" for everyone who wants to straighten out his or her psyche, no matter which way it's bent. If I were in book marketing, I would sure have noticed by now that we're looking at a huge generation of aging baby boomers, and we can bet the farm that they'll all be facing death, loss, grief and a struggle for the spiritual resources to cope with same. Prozac and Viagra will get us only so far in this world.

For intelligent, entertaining, useful and well-written books on aspects of our mortality, I recommend:

• "She Came to Live Out Loud" by Myra MacPherson, published by Scribner. This one appears at first to be the story of a woman who died of breast cancer. Her name was Anna Johannessen; she was a teacher and a mother who lived near Washington, D.C.; and despite the fact that it's clear we would have adored her if we had known her, well, we all have our own friends who are dead or dying of breast cancer, or some other cancer, and they're all wonderful people, too. We don't need to weep over the death of some stranger, lovely human though she may have been.

But the book turns into much more than a memorial to a good but mercifully imperfect woman. It's really about the hole that was left by her death – the vacuum in the lives of the people who loved her and what they learned to do about it.

MacPherson is first and always a reporter with a grasp of what we call "the universal third." That's the third paragraph of a newspaper story about a small, specific event that turns it into a consideration of a much larger phenomenon.

MacPherson happens to be married to former state Sen. Jack Gordon of Florida, who is all by himself practically enough to redeem the reputation of American politicians and who heads Hospice Foundation of America. Through working with the hospice movement, MacPherson became familiar with the mechanics, as it were, of death and grief, and she can write about them like any smart reporter. but she also had to confront the death of her mother and the grief and ambivalence that came with it. All of this is shared – both the personal and the larger view – and meshed into Anna's story or into what is really the story of those who loved Anna.

• Anne Lamott's "Traveling Mercies: Some Thoughts on Faith," published by Pantheon. For those of you who have an unfortunate visceral reaction when someone says the word "Christian" (a common side effect among those who suffered severe early exposure to the more primitive reaches of Southern Baptist), Lamott is the answer. Mostly because she doesn't have that many answers – she's just funny. And honest. And if you've forgotten that being honest is the root of being funny, try Anne Lamott.

Remember the story of the Emperor Who Wore No Clothes? One of the funniest things in civilization today is the number of pretentious people walking around buck naked. Lamott is not out to expose them or to point out what fools they are – that just happens as a side effect of her being so honest.

• Dare we call her the Doyenne of Death? The beloved Jessica Mitford, who died two years ago, was the author of the classic debunking of the American funeral industry: "The American Way of Death." Before she herself croaked – she had a GREAT funeral, and it was really cheap, too – she revised her own by-now standard work on the funeral industry.

Unfortunately, the industry is worse than ever. It's been taken over by this multinational conglomerate called SCI (Service Corporation International – I ask you!). It's practically impossible to die in a Western country without paying SCI now.

Mitford, who was the droll misfit of the famous Brit Mitford sisters, will prove to have made the most enduring contribution, I think. She was an aristocratic commie and not the most likely of investigative reporters, but she was good at it. And she so thoroughly and ruthlessly and wittily exposed the vultures who feed on the grief and guilt of survivors that we shall be ever grateful.

Bureau is in over its head

Why are we being flooded again?

For the second time in three years, flooding is occurring above Milner dam! No floods happened in the 80 years prior to the flood of 1997, despite a number of high flow years. The Bureau of Reclamation states it has little control over outflows due to the demands of the private power and canal companies. With full, or filling reservoirs and high flows above, and some residual snow presence and higher temperatures we can expect more water!

We are told that nothing can be done to prevent more flooding by increasing the outflow at Milner dam because it might jeopardize canal levels and power generation. Catchup attempts include running the river at 'flood level' which is exactly what is happening! Apparently, past high flows were handled expeditiously by releasing appropriate outflows from the Milner pool.

Explanations by the Bureau defy common sense: 'Letting water out of the Milner pool will reduce available water for irrigation.' There appears to be plenty of water to spare, judging by the outflows of the reservoirs above, and by the increasingly rising water on my property.

I believe the Bureau management is "in over its head."

Call your senators, congressmen! We need help now!

Jerome ordinance stinks

As a dog groomer for the past 10 years in Jerome (not cat groomer), committee member of the mayor's animal control, parent of dogs and cats, I don't know which stinks worse, some cat's litter box, or this ordinance! I'm not against "some kind" of cat ordinance, just this particular ordinance.

Limiting of the number of only 3 pets per household targets good pet owners who are responsible and reduces adoption rate at shelters. In my 10 years of business, I've seen hundreds of multiple pet owners who are very responsible. Limiting number of pets per household should be applied to unspayed or neutered pets. Cats should not be put in the same category as dogs. They're entirely two different species.

We haven't solved the dog problems yet, not to mention the shelter. We have people who joined the committee because they wanted to target cats and openly stated so. One member stated at our last meeting, "I don't give a damn" (about welfare of dogs and cats). Attitudes such as these have no place on a committee trying to improve the animal ordinance.

Another individual joined the committee because cats were pooping in her flower beds, destroying her property. I have two uninvited squirrels pooping in my yard and scattering nut shells everywhere. Could we leash and license the squirrels when we do the cats?

The only solution I see to the overpopulation of cats is spaying and neutering. If the committee would have spent as much time working on some kind of spaying and neutering program, as they did "hissing" about cats, something would have been accomplished.

In the interim, I strongly urge pet owners of dogs and cats to please have your pets spayed/neutered. It's a known fact altered cats don't wander far from home. If your cat is unaltered and roams, you risk having it poisoned, dumped in the country, shot at with B.B. pellet guns, and hit by vehicles, sometimes intentionally.

Be a good pet owner. Your pet depends on you for its safety and protection from individuals with "cat annihilation attitudes."

Wendell makes mistake

I am upset and disgusted with the Wendell City Council, Wendell mayor, and Gooding county commissioner. This is due to the shutdown of the Wendell quick response unit. I was a member and mainly responded to the south side of the district due to where I live.

This shutdown is due to the lack of support and backbone from the city council and mayor. When they were approached by Bob Bailey and Red Orr, they said that they would have to go to the commissioners and that it was their problem.

I have been told that this issue will be taken before the county commissioners. It is my belief that nothing will happen because they do not want to deal with the EMS and the fact that they do not care about the citizens south of Wendell. If they did, they would not have taken the ambulance out of Wendell in the first place.

Now, without a QRU or ambulance in Wendell, it will no longer be 10 minutes till the first EMS unit is on the scene. A person will now have to wait 20-25 minutes for the ambulance out of Gooding. That extra 10-15 minutes can be life-threatening.

I just hope that the Wendell community will pull together and get the QRU running again.

Road plan lacks logic

I have listened for some time now to the debate on extending Fillmore Street from Falls Avenue to North College Road. In my opinion, it doesn't make sense to extend Fillmore when there are two other roads within one mile that connect with North College (three if you count Frontier Road). Blue Lakes and Washington are already in place with lights and improvements, and the proposed new strip mall can be easily reached from either street.

There seems to be the mentality that we need to do whatever new business wants us to do in order to accommodate them. Blue Lakes and Pole Line Road is a prime example of this. If the new mall can offer goods and services that people want and need, then people will come to them. They don't need a new road to get there.

I am also concerned about tearing up a beautiful section of town. The CSI campus is a very special place to many people in town and the grass and trees and parks are enjoyed by all. If we tear part of this up and add blacktop and traffic, we are taking a step backwards. We need to preserve the CSI campus and keep traffic out of recreational areas and residential neighborhoods.

For the record, I do not live anywhere near the new proposed road.

Save recreational facility

At 6 p.m. Monday evening, the Twin Falls City Council will hold its third and final hearing on the zoning change needed for the strip mall adjoining CSI and Jules Harrison Ford. Joe Russell and his legal adviser have said in the last two city council hearings that the mall is not a viable venture without opening Fillmore Street from North College Road to Falls Avenue.

On the same evening at 5:30 p.m., the college board has Fillmore Street on their docket for a discussion with adjacent property owners and other concerned individuals.

Through the efforts of the College of Southern Idaho, our City Recreational Department and Citizen work groups we have developed one of the finest recreational facilities in the area. Now we are being asked to allow it to be torn up for a commercial street through the heart of it which will continue on to one of the most beautiful old town streets in our city.

We presented both the city council and our college president with a petition signed by 340-plus adjoining homeowners, residents of Fillmore Street from Addison Avenue to Falls Avenue and recreational users of these fine facilities of Frontier Park. These many signatures supported the following statement:

"We the undersigned individuals object to opening the segment of Fillmore Street from the southwest corner of the proposed strip mall to Filer Avenue. We further state that the recreational values of the ball fields, the fitness trail, the conifer tree screening, the escape from roadway traffic into a park-like atmosphere, the impact on adjacent home owners, and the loss of our fire station and the low traffic directed through our residential neighborhoods of the southern blocks of Fillmore are values far outweighing a back door access for the new strip mall and other commercial traffic."

Our city council and our city administrators, as well as the College of Southern Idaho Board, have given us this opportunity to be heard before a decision is made. We implore you to be at one of these meetings and speak out.

We can fight the traffic of Blue Lakes or take the long way around or get along without one more mall to preserve these great values and for the quality of life they offer. How about you?

Love your dad? Don't give him shorts

Today is Father's Day, so consider this an appeal to all you mothers and kids:

Don't buy Dad shorts this year. Just say no.

I know, I know: Summer beckons and he whines a lot about the heat, but the truth of the matter is that 99 percent of adult males have unsightly legs.

Not unattractive legs, mind you: Butt-ugly ones.

And yet the man in your life presupposes it's OK. You see, he spent most of his youth in Levi's cutoffs, and has convinced himself that nothing much has changed.

And that's compounded by the fact that he has no clue how to dress those legs. The fashion sense of the typical man has not advanced a whit since Fred Flintstone, which explains why wearing Bermuda shorts with black socks and white deck shoes is nowhere considered an indictable offense.

It should be.

And the shorter the shorts, the longer the sentence: You and I have both seen men guilty of excessive flying hairiness.

The worst part is, their sons grow up thinking they should dress the same way.

I was fishing up at Magic last summer, and there was a family of three on a boat – Dad, teen-age son, younger kid – dressed identically: cloth hat, mirror sunglasses, orange muscle shirts and Speed-Os. Dad weighed about 250 pounds.

Genetically, these kids don't have a chance. And generations of fish yet unborn are destined to be scared out of their scales.

My own father taught me many important lessons, but the greatest was to keep my legs to myself.

To drive home that point, he introduced me to Birdlegs.

Nobody called him Birdlegs to his face, off course. His real name was Fackenzill Burtess (pronounced BU-tars), an Arbon Valley farmer so painfully bowlegged that he could play Sally Goodin' just walkin' down the stairs.

As befit a Baptist and a Mason, he was circumspect about couture – favoring denim overalls. Except at the annual community picnic.

The Arbon alfresco, scheduled the first Saturday of each August, was just for families who had been in the valley for more than 20 years. It was held at a little spa near American Falls called Indian Springs, which consisted of two picnic tables and a hot-springs-fed swimming pool.

On that particular Saturday – and only on that day – Birdlegs would doff his overalls and put on a pair of swimming trunks.

His knees were gnarled and chapped; the left one looked a little like the face of the troll in fairy tale "The Three Billygoats Gruff." Birdlegs' shins were alabaster colored, but from the ankles down covered in a vicuna-like coat of curly auburn hair.

Small children would snigger and strong women gasp when he walked through the parking lot, the carelessly tied laces from his Red Wing work boots fluttering against his naked calves.

Potato salad and watermelon consumption would plummet after Birdlegs' arrival; even country people have their limits. He would be encouraged to get into the pool as soon as possible – and stay there indefinitely.

Then one spring, Birdlegs was putting a new roof on the barn and fell off, fracturing both legs. Relief was palpable: Men in casts, after all, don't turn up for picnics in shorts.

Grand View may host low-level waste

Non-regulated material doesn't fall under federal definition of radioactive waste

By H.S. Rikkenhaul
Times-News writer

GRAND VIEW – An Idaho hazardous-waste disposal company has signed a contract to dispose of hazardous waste that includes low-level radioactive material, though the facility is not licensed to dispose of radioactive waste.

Envirosafe Services of Idaho in Grand View, located southwest of Mountain Home, has won a contract worth nearly $400 million to dispose of radioactive waste for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

The company doesn't have a state permit to dispose of radioactive waste, said Brian Monson of the state Division of Environmental Quality's hazardous materials bureau.

But then this isn't ordinary radioactive waste; it's non-regulated radioactive waste. The federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission doesn't regulate it, so the state doesn't regulate it; and therefore, technically it's not radioactive waste, even though the waste is radioactive.

The waste is radioactive but at a level below regulatory concern, and therefore the state doesn't consider it radioactive waste, Monson said.

For more online: Newslink

That's just government double-talk to some.

Members of the statewide nuclear watchdog group Snake River Alliance say that unregulated disposal of radioactive waste should not be allowed, said Margaret Macdonald Stewart of the Alliance's Ketchum office.

The $396-million contract calls for disposing of 400,000 to 500,000 cubic yards of "non-hazardous, non-regulated" soil-like waste over five to 10 years, Spomer said.

The waste is from cleanup of old Manhattan Project sites around the country – a program known as "Formerly Utilized Sites Remedial Action Program" that handles leftover wastes from the top secret program that developed the atom bomb during World War II.

The program formerly was handled by the Energy Department, but two years ago Congress turned the project over to the Corps of Engineers.

"We have a reputation for getting things done," said George Hanley, Corps spokesman in Kansas City, Mo.

The material to be disposed of is from sites contaminated with byproducts of uranium mining and processing. The levels of radiation are very low, "but still they are radioactive sites," Hanley said.

Any company that accepts radioactive waste for disposal must have an NRC license. But some of the companies with contracts for disposal that includes radioactive waste do not have licenses. Such sites would have up to one year to get a license, Hanley said.

"Nothing will happen until they get that license," he said.

But Envirosafe does not plan to accept any waste that requires an NRC license, Spomer said.

Snake River Canyon provides jazzy summer venue

By Theresa Ajcoby
Times-News writer

TWIN FALLS – What would a local jazz musician say about Jazz in the Canyon?

"It's about time," said Jeff Fox, a tenor saxophonist with Concepts Jazz and a local promoter of live jazz.

Fox said the best part of the fund-raiser, sponsored by the Twin Falls and Jerome Rotary clubs, is the participation of local groups – and the whole concept of performing jazz live in the Snake River Canyon.

Jim Mair, director of jazz studies at the College of Southern Idaho, was commissioned to book artists for the first-ever Jazz in the Canyon festival.

Mair wanted to expose the audience to a cross-section of jazz influences, he said. Plus, he wanted to bring in musicians – locally, regionally and nationally – who respond well with audiences.

After last year's Rotary Club fund-raiser, the Brewfest event in City Park, the club was looking to try something new that incorporated families and children, said special projects chairwoman Jody Tremblay.

Proceeds from the festival will benefit the Rock Creek Park system.

Jazz enthusiasts said the music and the canyon setting harmonized well.

Farmers cope with tough season

By Casean Hart
Times-News correspondent

RUPERT – Tom Christ is tired.

There are lines of fatigue in his face and three days of stubble on his chin. He disked his fields until 4 a.m. one day and then got up early to go back to his tractor. And he's carrying stress baggage that more and more farmers are sharing these days.

Like his fellow farmers, Christ has been trying since December to get financing for this year. He owns 130 acres and has paid back last year's operating loan, but he didn't show a profit and still owes farm-related debts. He had asked a woman at the bank if they were issuing many loans, he said.

"Not very many," Christ recalled her telling him. "She was proud of it!"

Last year, Christ's brother Steve Christ and cousin Jim Christ worked with him. But Steve got a job at Paul Chemical and Fertilizers and Jim is working for another farmer, because the farm isn't making it.

Recently divorced, he's on his own.

"A lot of the businesses are really understanding," Christ said. "They've let me ride. But the interest eats you up."

Norland farmer Randee Martin agreed.

"This year is a survival year," Martin said. "If we don't survive this year, a lot of us will voluntarily leave the farming industry."

Martin said he is frustrated because farmers only can blame themselves for the problems.

"The ag industry is facing a self-imposed crisis," he said. "We're producing so well we're hurting ourselves."

Martin also had to wait to get his financing this year, he said, adding that he feels that banks have tightened up their policies quite a bit.

D.L. Evans Bank's Burley loan officer Roger Facer agrees that last year was a hard one.

"Our farm loans haven't been smaller, so I don't know," he said. "I hear some are not getting financed."

Harold Mohlman, who farms in Norland, has received his operating capital, but is tightening his belt.

"We try to cut everywhere we can, but you can't foresee everything," Mohlman said. "A late cold spring frost on the potato vines ... We farmers are a pretty prideful lot. We don't like to complain. But we're hiring less labor this year."

"What's a loaf of bread cost? $1.29? We're getting $2.50 a bushel for wheat," Mohlman said. "That'd make 60 loaves of bread. It's 1950s prices for the farmer, and 1990s prices at the grocery store."

But John Pogue of Norland has a different approach. With his partner he farms six acres, and does not apply for operating capital.

"We don't finance anything. And we struggle all the time."

State hustles to make hog waste regulations

By Mark Warbis
Associated Press Writer

BOISE – Legislators, county officials and state agencies are scrambling to develop rules for handling waste from huge hog and chicken operations proposed in Idaho.

Meanwhile, the state Department of Agriculture is working on regulations for managing the potential water pollution risks from each of Idaho's 1,000 dairies – from the smallest with two goats in Teton County to the largest with about 4,000 cows in the Magic Valley.

And on a broader scale, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and the National Resources Conservation Service are developing new "comprehensive nutrient management plans" to regulate waste from all large livestock operations, including cattle feedlots.

But is all the effort really needed to protect Idaho from a potential influx of corporate farms threatening to wreak havoc on water quality and make rural areas less liveable for Idaho's growing population?

Are officials wisely getting ahead of the curve on a key environmental issue of the new millennium? Or are state and local leaders succumbing to what one livestock industry leader calls "total hysteria?"

"There's so much coming down the pike from all angles right now, and none of it's codified yet," said Greg Garatea, a Paul rancher and feedlot operator who is president-elect of the Idaho Cattle Association. "I hate to see people and agencies burn a lot of resources and manpower and then find out it's not going to be in compliance with what the feds have coming down."

State Sen. Laird Noh, a Republican member of the Senate Agricultural Affairs Committee, has been watching the issue closely and understands Garatea's misgivings. But the Kimberly sheep rancher also has seen controversy and conflicts grow along with southern Idaho's booming dairy industry. And he sees the chance for the state to avoid possible problems by enacting hog and chicken rules sooner rather than later.

"States from Virginia through Utah and Wyoming have been through this experience," Noh said. "They have learned a great deal, and if we fail to benefit from their experience, our intelligence rating isn't very high."

He and others question whether the state is yet doing enough to cope with the environmental realities of the national trend toward mega-farms, often owned by absentee investors. More animals generally are concentrated on less acreage, and the additional waste they generate can be too much for the land to bear without polluting surface and ground water.

The state Agriculture Department already is working with the EPA and the state's Division of Environmental Quality to ensure the dairy industry does not overwhelm Idaho's carrying capacity. The number of cows being milked statewide has grown more than 50 percent to about 280,000 since 1991, and those cows are confined in about half as many dairies now.

The Magic Valley alone, with less than a fifth of Idaho's land base, supports more than half the state's dairy herd.

Girl Scouting gives homeless hope

But recently, as an officer checked IDs and scattered loiterers outside a Salt Lake homeless shelter, two little girls emerged and demanded a cuddle.

The girls belong to Salt Lake's only group of homeless Girl Scouts, nicknamed "Troop Blue" for the female officers who are their leaders. The members, about 30 girls between the ages of 7 and 15, live at the Salt Lake Community and Self Sufficiency Center run by the Travelers' Aid Society.

"The kids are always excited when they find adults who they think can help them and who they can relate to. Their parents are somewhat emotionally absent from their lives," said Jenny Beckstrand, a shelter employee and troop volunteer.

In the shelter, each family sleeps in a single room. They share a bathroom and kitchen with 30 other families and eat at one of two communal tables.

But with the Scouts, the girls get a chance to practice for a different life. For one recent project, troop leaders held a clinic on manners and etiquette, then took the girls out to use what they had learned.

Until that evening, most of the girls had never been out to eat, said Beckstrand. But on this night a group of Westminster College students had used their extra dining credits to borrow a banquet hall and served the troop steaks on the school's best china. They loved it.

"They used their napkins correctly, said 'please' and 'thank you' and asked lots of questions," Beckstrand said. "I think they had more fun getting ready to go. They fixed their hair special and did their nails."

Members of the troop, which was founded 10 years ago and has had police volunteers since 1990, also get paid trips to summer camp near Provo provided by the Girls Scout Council.

For these girls, who may not have the flashlights or five pairs of underwear required for overnight camps, sponsorship means more than just an entry fee and the shelter tries to help out.

"Last year the little girl couldn't even take her pillow to camp because she and her sister shared it," Beckstrand said. "We're already rummaging through donations trying to come up with everything they'll need."

But she says it's worth it.

"Last year I picked them up after their week and they laughed and sang all the way home. Then they sang camp songs for weeks. I could tell they had a great time."

'Jessica,' age 7, munches a cookie as she plays with another Girl Scout from 'Troop Blue' in Salt Lake City.

The troop gives the girls, who aren't allowed to play outside their rooms without adult supervision, a chance to meet. It also provides some constancy when the average shelter stay is about three months. If members decide to continue with Girl Scouts after leaving the shelter, the national organization sponsors them for a year.

Troop Blue includes immigrants from two African countries, a girl from New Jersey, girls who have been at the shelter for seven months, girls who left the shelter and returned and girls who could be gone tomorrow.

"The girls are often in the troop for a month or two," said Lillian Hernandez, Girl Scout Outreach Program specialist.

So the group holds ceremonies to give out badges every month, rather than once a year as in most troops. And leaders try to ease the transition by emphasizing the importance of new friendships.

The group is also getting to know scouts from a different background. On Monday, a troop from the Salt Lake suburb of Sandy visited the shelter for a joint meeting.

The Sandy troop brought Girl Scout sashes for the shelter girls. Troop Blue gave out candy necklaces they had made and served cookies and punch. But mostly, the two groups just got a chance to hang out together.

"These are normal little girls," Beckstrand said. "They like the same rock stars, hair ribbons and nail polish the other Girl Scouts like," she said.

Such meetings can be a rude reminder of how different the children's lives really are. At a recent trip to the zoo, Beckstrand's girls had to wait outside a special exhibit watching other troops go through because they didn't have the entry fee.

For the most part, however, meetings are a chance to have fun. The girls say they love the singing and dancing, the field trips and the companionship.

An 8-year-old named Deena who recently returned to the shelter says she remembers a marshmallow and cookie craft project the best.

Jessica, 7, says she loves that her older brother can't come and she can play with the other girls without being bothered.

Like Anshar, a 15-year-old Ugandan immigrant who is trying to improve her English and constantly begs the adults to read to her.

"When can you read tomorrow?," she asks Beckstrand.

"What time?" Anshar persists.

"What time?" repeats Anshar.

"12:01," jokes Beckstrand.

"I'll be there," says Anshar.

"If I had to name one reason for the success of this troop," said Hernandez, "it would be the consistency and dedication of the volunteer leaders."

Hernandez said police officers through the years have never failed the girls, always making sure there are capable replacements when they move on. The tradition continues with troop leader Debbie Findlay and her assistant, Angie Portel – bicycle cops who once were Girl Scouts themselves.

NASA launches weather satellite

VANDENBERG AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. (AP) – A satellite was launched Saturday night on a $98 million mission to improve weather forecasting and detect the onset of conditions like El Nino by measuring winds blowing over Earth's oceans.

A Titan II rocket carrying NASA's QuikScat satellite roared off a central coast launch pad at 7:15 p.m. PDT, headed for a polar orbit 500 miles high.

"Things are looking just great right now. The lift off was very smooth," said Frank O'Donnell, a spokesman for NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory in Pasadena.

The launch sequence was expected to take about an hour. QuikScat's first signal was not expected to be heard until 76 minutes after liftoff when it passes over Norway.

A series of recent failures raised concerns about Titan rockets, but QuikScat mission officials were confident their booster would operate properly.

The mission, intended to last two years with an option for a third, was put together in just 12 months.

QuikScat – short for Quick Scatterometer – was designed as a quick replacement for a NASA instrument on a Japanese satellite that failed in 1997 less than a year in orbit.

The new satellite's instrument is a radar antenna that can radiate microwave pulses over wide areas of the Earth and listen for their faint echo.

The satellite was given the capability of collecting data in a continuous 1,100-mile-wide swath, achieving 400,000 measurements over 90 percent of Earth's surface daily, vastly exceeding the data collected by buoys and ships.

The return signals – the scatter – allow scientists to determine wind speeds and directions at the surface of the oceans.

The force of wind is an important part of ocean circulation, and understanding the interaction is important for short- and long-term weather prediction.

QuikScat data has been eagerly awaited by forecasters, hurricane meteorologists and oceanographers studying the weather-altering cycle of El Nino and La Nina.

Titan rockets, which come in various configurations, have been involved in three costly failures since last summer.

On Aug. 12, a Titan IVA exploded 41 seconds after liftoff, destroying a spy satellite. A Titan IVB put a missile-warning satellite into a useless orbit on April 9 and the same type of rocket left a military communications satellite in the wrong orbit on April 30.

Nethercutt, foes spend big on ads

SPOKANE (AP) – The election may not be for 17 months, but U.S. Rep. George Nethercutt and his opponents have covered the airwaves with ads about his decision to seek a fourth term.

Nethercutt, a Republican from Spokane, has spent $33,500 on television ads this week to explain why he changed his mind about serving only three terms in Congress. Nethercutt announced last Sunday that he would seek a fourth term.

A group called U.S. Term Limits has spent $26,225 to buy commercials attacking Nethercutt on two Spokane television stations. Group officials are negotiating to buy more ads on a third station.

"I've never seen (political ads) this early," said Kirby McKee, who handles political commercials for KXLY-TV. "It'll get worse before it gets better."

U.S. Term Limits, based in Washington, D.C., also spent nearly $5,000 for a full-page ad in Wednesday's The Spokesman-Review newspaper. The ad suggested a new word – "nethercut" – should be added to the dictionary as a synonym for going back on one's word.

Regatta brings crowds and need for safe boating

By John T. Huddy
Times-News writer

BURLEY – While Idaho Regatta organizers put the final touches on the event and local racers tweak their boats, officials who will patrol the water are asking the public to be safe.

Tim Little, head of the Cassia County Sheriff's Department's marine patrol, said the Regatta brings crowds to the river. And with crowds comes potential disaster.

Little said racing draws many boaters into the course area, making it dangerous for racers and boaters. The marine patrol is responsible for closing down the race area between the Overland Bridge in Burley to the island northeast of the Burley City Golf Course.

If a boater enters the restricted area, the chance for a collision with a racing boat is high. The result of a collision could be horrendous, Little said.

Little said it's important to observe safe boating. Boaters should read signs and buoys, make sure there are enough lifejackets on board for all passengers, observe other boats and personal watercraft in the area and show courtesy to others in the water.

Idaho Boating Basics, a handbook put out by the Idaho Department of Parks and Recreation, stresses the need for water safety.

Boaters should be careful not to overload passengers on their vessel, watch for fuel leaks, and make sure to display the required navigation lights.

Negligent operation is a key factor in most boating accidents. The handbook says to avoid excessive speed in a congested area, excessive speed in foggy or stormy conditions, operating a boat under the influence of drugs or alcohol and cutting through a regatta or marine parade in progress.

Officials suspend national park head

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) – The new superintendent of Capitol Reef National Park has been suspended for one month for retaliating against a whistle-blowing employee at his last posting.

Albert J. Hendricks is on leave without pay until July 1 for alleged violations of the federal Whistleblower Protection Act at his previous job running Crater Lake National Park in Oregon.

Hendricks, a 28-year veteran of the National Park Service, was under investigation when he was transferred to Capitol Reef in November, The Salt Lake Tribune reported Saturday in a copyright story.

A Crater Lake employee named Stephen Robinson told the Office of Special Counsel that he and his wife lost their summer jobs at the park after he complained to Hendricks in 1996 about the tour boats used there.

Robinson, who has worked for the Park Service for 21 years, said the boat operator, Crater Lake Lodge Co., used unsafe boats and employed unqualified pilots.

"Basically, we were blacklisted," said Robinson, a former park educator who since has been hired at Crater Lake as a fire lookout.

Robinson and his wife, Amelia Bruno, claim Hendricks broke the law protecting employees who expose crime, waste and safety issues.

The investigation "revealed strong evidence that Mr. Robinson and Ms. Bruno were denied employment in retaliation for Mr. Robinson's disclosures concerning the safety of the tourist boats," reads an OSC news release posted on the agency's Web page.

The release goes on to say that the Park Service settled the couple's complaint. Robinson and Bruno were reimbursed for some $40,000 in lost pay and Hendricks was taken off the job for a month.

"The Park Service's decision should send a clear message to its employees that there's a price to be paid for retaliating against whistleblowers," said OSC attorney Elaine Kaplan.

Park Service officials say Hendricks deserves a second chance after 20 years of experience as a supervisor.

"People make mistakes and learn from mistakes," said Ron Everhart, a deputy regional director for the Park Service. "We're willing to give him an opportunity to show that he learned from his mistakes and has been a good superintendent."

Public TV will show program about homosexuality

MOSCOW (AP) – The state Board of Education will not prohibit Idaho Public Television from airing a documentary about homosexuality this fall, but it voted to "strongly recommend" that those who have objections to the documentary be given air time as well.

The board, meeting Friday, responded to complaints from the Christian Coalition and others that the video, "It's Elementary," is too pro-homosexual and should not be shown on a public station that gets 25 percent of its funding from state tax dollars.

The documentary is intended to instruct teachers and parents on how to deal with classroom or playground situations when issues regarding homosexuality surface.

It is scheduled to air on Sept. 7 at 10 p.m. Two nights later, Idaho Public Television plans to follow up with the viewer call-in show "Dialogue," where residents can express their views about "It's Elementary."

Out of the 347 public television stations in the nation, 89 plan to air the documentary while at least 80 have turned it down. Some accepted the documentary on the condition that a rebuttal video called "Suffer the Children" also airs.

That is what may happen in Idaho as a result of the board's motion Friday.

Nancy Bloomer, executive director of the Christian Coalition, said the organization would probably accept an invitation to show a rebuttal video, but its preference is that the documentary not air at all.

"It's not in the interest of public television to show this at all," Bloomer said, after learning of the board's decision. "There's not one part of the film that addresses the health issues related to homosexuality or the spiritual well-being of the children."

Hogs

ment plans for dairies throughout Idaho are aimed at going the federal standards that are in the works one better. For that, Agriculture Department Director Pat Takasugi credits willing farmers.

"The dairy industry chose to move forward," he said. "The other industries are choosing other routes."

However, Noh warned that having a state-of-the-art dairy waste program would not necessarily provide the protection Idaho needs since the state of the art is not all that high.

"My knowledge of the circumstances in other states is that almost all those states are pretty pathetic," he said. "It is not a pretty picture."

The specter of gigantic hog and chicken operations presents another challenge for county commissioners. They are unclear about their authority to impose siting restrictions that strike a balance between economic development and demands from residents increasingly unwilling to live with the stench and possible health impacts of factory farms.

The Idaho Association of Counties recently formed a task force to study the issue and work with state agencies and lawmakers on any legislation deemed necessary to ensure big agricultural businesses are held accountable.

Prompting from concerned county leaders resulted in legislators last winter directing DEQ and the Agriculture Department to draft rules that would govern the kind of hog and chicken operations some developers have indicated they want to locate in Idaho.

Talks are under way with environmental groups, farm organizations and others on comprehensive regulations – something like those being put in place for dairies – that will be presented to the Legislature in January.

DEQ Administrator Steve Allred said Idaho's existing air and water quality laws should be enough to ensure any restrictions the state imposes can be enforced.

That climate has Garatea convinced the beef industry soon will face more state control in addition to tougher federal rules.

"It's one thing to put the time and resources into coming into compliance with the federal government, but then you're hit with the state and then you have the county livestock confinement ordinances," he said. "I just don't know how flexible the industry is out there to comply with everything that's coming down the pike."

As a farmer himself, Takasugi sympathizes.

"We're breaking new ground here and we're feeling our way as we progress," he said. "As a potential person to be regulated, I can see why you'd be concerned. This thing looks awfully big and awfully nasty and awfully costly."

But Takasugi insists his agency and the Kempthorne administration are not out to put anyone out of business.

"We would be looking at regulating and educating and servicing altogether, not just fining them and walking away without even addressing the problem," he said.

"We've worked with the dairymen, and I think we can do that with other industries."

A look at Idaho's growing livestock industry

Here is a look at the size of Idaho's livestock sectors as the state and federal governments and counties consider how to cope with the waste from those animals.

- Dairy: There are about 280,000 cows being milked at about 1,000 dairies. In 1991, Idaho had about 50 percent fewer milk cows but almost twice as many dairy farms.

The industry now brings in more than $800 million a year, making dairy Idaho's single biggest agricultural commodity and Idaho the nation's sixth-largest dairy state.

- Beef: While larger overall than the dairy herd, the number of beef cattle in Idaho has declined since 1991 from about 980,000 to roughly 935,000.
- Hogs: There were about 52,000 in 1991 and now are only about 38,000. But that number would increase exponentially if Sawtooth Farms LLC follows through on its proposal to build a 250,000-hog facility with the capacity to produce 5 million animals a year.
- Chickens: The flock has grown to 1.89 million from 1.15 million in 1991. But a project being discussed for the Burley area reportedly would involve raising and processing about 50 million birds a year.
- Sheep: There are about 285,000 sheep in Idaho, only about 5 percent more than in 1991.

Jazz

Tony LaRosa and Kathe Redden, who came to the festival from Idaho Falls, said the Snake River Canyon was an impressive backdrop.

"We need more and more and more of this in Twin Falls," said Fran Hutchens of Twin Falls. "It's marvelous for young people to gain an appreciation of jazz."

The service organization hopes Jazz in the Canyon will be an annual event, Tremblay said.

"I can see this thing getting bigger and bigger every year," Rotarian Bill Mogensen said. "It's a good family outing – the venue is just absolutely beautiful."

That's true, of course: Motivated by the coming picnic, Birdlegs' recovery was remarkable. He had the casts taken off the very day before the picnic.

I'm not sure if you're familiar what happens to the average guy's legs when they've been encased in plastic for three months, and Birdlegs was certainly not your average guy.

They didn't hold the Arbon picnic after that, and as far as I know, my dad never took his pants off again.

That's a valuable example, I think, but my mother helped by installing full-length mirrors in every room in the house.

This Father's Day, go and do likewise. And never more give short shrift to Dad's wardrobe.

Revised forest rules make restoration highest priority

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) – New rules drafted to guide U.S. Forest Service planning would make restoring watersheds, forests and rangelands the agency's top priority in managing 191 million acres of public land.

The proposed rules also could help institutionalize Clinton administration policies that have slashed Forest Service logging by 70 percent while expanding conservation policies.

Conservationists quickly praised the plan.

"Overall, I would say they've made a scientifically-credible effort," said Michael Anderson of The Wilderness Society. "This would get the national forests off to a good start in the next century."

But the timber industry questioned whether the administration can make such sharp policy changes through rules, rather than legislation.

"If they want to redefine the purpose of the national forests, then they have to go to Congress," said Jim Geisinger, president of the Northwest Forestry Association, which represents companies that buy timber from public land. "We think the intent of these changes in policy is to prevent a future administration from establishing a more balanced management plan."

The draft document calls for the Forest Service to make forest sustainability its "guiding star," adding the health of forest and rangeland plants and animals is essential to achieving that goal.

The draft rules are scheduled to be released for public comment in July. They could be made final as early as February. The rules then would guide planning on the 155 national forests.

The draft builds on many of the regional planning and wildlife protection strategies fleshed out in the 1993 Northwest Forest Plan that helped end court battles over logging in northern spotted owl habitat.

Norm Johnson, an Oregon State University forestry professor who helped write the Northwest Forest Plan, was chairman of a scientific panel that helped forge the draft rules.

The Forest Service's planning rules were last changed in 1982. Efforts to revamp them have a long and tortured history.

A Bush administration effort ran into opposition from conservationists and died as the 1992 elections approached. Another effort got under way during Clinton's first term, when biologist Jack Ward Thomas was named forest chief, but it also proved controversial and never was finished.

Within the next two weeks, Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, is expected to introduce a bill that would redefine the Forest Service's mission. Craig has been working on the bill for more than a year, conducting hearings and consulting with conservationists, the timber industry and other groups with a stake in the national forests.

Mark Rey, an aide who is helping draft Craig's bill, said it would embrace the idea of ecological sustainability. But he said the bill would give more importance to economic opportunities.

Nez Perce, state disagree over spring chinook fishing season

LEWISTON (AP) – State officials are displeased with a decision by the Nez Perce Tribe to open a spring chinook fishing season.

On Friday, the tribe opened a three-day ceremonial and subsistence fishing season on the North Fork of the Clearwater River, Clear Creek near Kooskia and the Little Salmon River and Rapid River.

The tribe has a spring chinook season during most years, but this year hatchery managers are concerned because the returning adults are the offspring of the 1995 run, the worst on record.

Because of that, they are expecting a shortage of fish and not being able to meet spawning goals.

This year 3,322 chinook and 2,407 chinook jacks have passed over Lower Granite Dam. The jacks, fish that return after a single season in the ocean, are not usually used for spawning.

Virgil Moore, chief of the Idaho Department of Fish and Game's fisheries bureau in Boise, expressed concern over the level of harvest on Rapid River in a letter to Nez Perce fisheries manager Silas Whitman.

'The department believes the Nez Perce tribal proposal ... severely affects future production and fishery opportunity for both sport and tribal fishers.'

– Virgil Moore, Idaho Fish and Game

"The department believes the Nez Perce tribal proposal ... severely affects future production and fishery opportunity for both sport and tribal fishers."

Moore asked the tribe to reduce the limit on Rapid River to 30 fish, about 3 percent of the run.

In response, Nez Perce Tribal Executive Committee Chairman Samuel N. Penney wrote that the tribe recognized the status of this year's run and he acknowledged the tribe has, in the past, voluntarily reduced harvest when runs where poor.

But he said that was with the understanding the state would take actions to recover the runs.

"Unfortunately, the state of Idaho's failure to support the provision of additional water from the Upper Snake and rewatering the Lower Snake River to a natural river condition by breaching the dams ... jeopardizes the very survival and recovery of all the runs that return to Nez Perce country and the state of Idaho."

Dworshak National Fish Hatchery manager Bill Miller said he would prefer to have the fish in the hatchery and have more eggs for spawning. But he said this year's jack counts are encouraging and there should be plenty of fish next year.

Group forms plan to raise UI president's pay

MOSCOW (AP) – While the state Board of Education supports the idea of supplementing the University of Idaho president's salary, it wants more details from the university's foundation on the plan.

At the board's monthly meeting, the University of Idaho Foundation unveiled a plan to supplement President Robert Hoover's annual salary by 7.7 percent, augment his insurance and give him a $350,000 retirement annuity if he stays at the university another eight years.

"His leadership speaks for itself. He has led the university in a direction his supporters and friends are delighted with," Emma Atchley, the foundation's vice president, said Friday.

Although the board voted 7-1 to endorse the idea of the supplement, it asked the foundation to work with board office employees to draft a proposal to bring to the board's next meeting.

"The whole concept is public institutions becoming more private and private institutions becoming more public," board member Tom Dillon said.

Dillon asked the foundation to provide a statement releasing the board from liability if it chose at some time to fire Hoover. He also wants the group to determine the value of the complete package and see if similar deals are being offered in other states.

Also on Friday, the board approved a five-year contract for University of Idaho head football coach Chris Tormey, in which he would make more than $139,000 a year in salary and endorsements.

The board also approved a four-year contract for head men's basketball coach C. David Farrar of more than $125,000 a year.

Dillon said the new salaries are on par with median salaries for coaches in Division I football and basketball.

Benewah County rallies to keep hospital open

ST. MARIES (AP) – Camille Scott thought Benewah Community Hospital stood no chance of surviving when she became chief executive officer.

It had just taken on $3.5 million in debt. And even though it is county-owned, the hospital got no operating revenue from taxpayers. The purchase of badly needed equipment was left to volunteer fund-raisers, who set a goal of $500,000.

"I thought, 'In a community of 2,500 people, how is this going to happen?'" Scott recalled.

Three years later, Benewah Community Hospital is turning a solid profit.

The $3.5 million expansion is bringing in vital outpatient business. And the number of inpatients has doubled since 1996. Volunteers even have raised more than $350,000 for equipment.

"I'm a hometown girl. It's real important to me," said Francie Walters, a recently retired nurse at the hospital and head of the BetterCare fund-raising committee.

Hospital officials have been wholeheartedly cultivating such personal relationships with local residents. Doctors and other staff play softball in the city league. High school students are enlisted to write a safe camping book for little kids. The hospital cosponsors a bus that takes senior citizens to the Wellness Center 18 miles west in Plummer.

Scott also has worked to keep patients whenever possible from going to Coeur d'Alene or Spokane, Wash., for treatment.

"We're not letting anybody get out of this county for health care," Scott said. "We have to educate people that bigger is not better."

PROSECUTING POLYGAMY

Court may have to decide issue of religious right vs. breaking the law

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) – Tom Green and his five wives believe practicing polygamy is their God-given right, though they're not sure now is the time to ask the courts to agree.

But the Greens may have no say in the timetable for determining the constitutionality of a law that makes their peaceful and isolated life in Utah's western desert essentially an outlaw existence.

David Leavitt, the Juab County attorney and brother to the governor, expects to decide by July whether to prosecute the Greens for bigamy. If they fight the charges, the case – hinging on constitutional rights of religious liberty and equal protection – could be the vehicle for deciding whether polygamy is a protected religious practice.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1879 that it wasn't. But that has not deterred some 30,000 mainly Mormon fundamentalists in the West from practicing plural marriage under the averted eyes of law enforcement agencies.

"It's a question that begs to be answered," says defense attorney Ken Brown of Salt Lake. "If it's not hurting anybody, it's not otherwise a crime, then aren't you being prosecuted for exercising your religious belief? That's a good test case and a good case to defend."

Leavitt concedes modern courts may not agree with a 120-year-old decision issued when anti-polygamy passions and rhetoric were at their height. The 1856 Republican National Party Platform, for example, labeled polygamy and slavery the "twin relics of barbarism."

"A court in 1999 or the year 2000 or whenever it gets there may look at it differently," Leavitt said. "There are potential First Amendment arguments and those should be raised."

"I'd rather go fishing," says Green, 51, who considers himself a fundamentalist Mormon practicing a commandment given by God to church founder Joseph Smith.

The mainstream Mormon church, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, abandoned polygamy in 1890 under intense federal pressure and as a precondition for Utah statehood. The faith excommunicates anyone who practices or even advocates polygamy.

Green and his wives have 25 children and support themselves by marketing magazine subscriptions from their outpost near the Nevada border.

Green says he and Leavitt have talked amicably about the prospect of a precedent-setting prosecution, but Green doubts the U.S. Supreme Court would reverse the old ruling.

"I don't mind going to jail for my beliefs," he said. "But why start out on a journey if there's no hope of arriving at the destination? If I thought we could do it, I'd say, all right, let's do it."

For decades, Utah law enforcers have ignored those who flout the state's bigamy statute, the law upholding the state Constitution's polygamy ban.

That is changing, though, in part because of pressure from Tapestry of Polygamy, a support group for former polygamist wives and children. Executive director Carmen Thompson says the advocacy group is merely pressing prosecutors to enforce a law that is a third-degree felony with a maximum five-year prison term. "It is not a religious issue. The bottom line is it's against the law," she said.

On Thursday, the Greens sued the group for defamation, claiming Thompson, Tapestry and its attorney lied when they suggested on television news programs the Green family is incestuous and abusive.

This spring, two central Utah prosecutors filed bigamy charges against polygamists after ex-wives complained. The women in both cases had help from Tapestry, which claims to have assisted 300 this year with everything from emotional support to escape to other states.

The first prosecuted bigamist, Steve Bronson in Millard County, agreed last month to a "plea in abeyance," which means his crime will be expunged if he lives only with his lawful wife for the next year.

The second, Mark Easterday, pleaded no contest to adultery in Sevier County on Tuesday. The disabled veteran says he would have liked to fight the bigamy charge, but had to plead to a misdemeanor to avoid jail and a protracted legal battle he could not afford. "I served honorably in the service for eight years and defended the freedom and rights of fellow Americans, and now I'm being persecuted for living my freedom," Easterday said. "I just hope the time comes where America wakes up."

In both cases, rural prosecutors say they were simply enforcing the law. "Do we get to pick and choose?" said Paul Lyman, who prosecuted Easterday.

Prosecutors in Utah's urban counties say the bigamy statute is freighted with constitutional problems. For one, it forbids cohabitation without defining it.

"You've got to decide if only the 'quote' polygamists are going to be prosecuted, or everybody that is illegally cohabiting," said Salt Lake County District Attorney David Yocom. "That becomes a real concern because the statute doesn't talk about polygamy. It may be a case of selective prosecution once these get filed and prosecuted."

Kay Bryson, Utah County attorney, says the law may be too vague. "It just leaves too much discretion to the prosecutor or to law enforcement or to the judge and that brings to my mind whether or not it's constitutional," Bryson said.

Idaho native gives $18M to Harvard

IDAHO FALLS (AP) – Idaho Falls native Greg Carr is realistic enough to know he cannot solve the world's problems, but he at least wants to put a dent in them.

And he is in a position to do it.

Carr, 39, recently made an $18 million donation to Harvard University, where the money will fund a human rights center at the John F. Kennedy School of Government.

Carr also plans more philanthropic projects in eastern Idaho, where he continues to have close ties.

"I still consider myself as being from here," he said.

A few years ago he made a substantial donation to the Idaho Falls Arts Council's $4.2 million Willard Arts Center renovation. The art gallery is named after his parents, Dr. Taylor and Betty Carr.

After making a fortune in the telecommunications business in the late 1980s and early '90s, Carr sold his company, Boston Technology Inc., and became chairman of the Internet service Prodigy.

He discovered that role gave him plenty of time to pay attention to the public policy issues he studied at Harvard. By 1998 he had sold a portion of his Prodigy stock and set up a foundation.

Meanwhile, a meeting with Chinese dissident Harry Woo in 1995 had made him think hard about human rights.

"It makes it very personal when you meet someone," Carr said. He began talking to officials at Harvard about establishing a human rights program at the Kennedy School.

Those talks culminated earlier this month with his donation, the largest Harvard ever has received from a Kennedy School alumnus. It will finance an endowment for operating support, a professorship and a facility to be called the Carr Center for Human Rights Policy.

"The reason I wanted to see Harvard get involved was there seemed to be a lot of growth, but not a lot of university involvement," he said. "This will help people think things through. My feeling was, 'Let's add a little rigor to good intentions.'"

Carr also would like to establish a connection between Idaho and human rights activities at Harvard. He already has started a summer internship for a student at Utah State University, where he was an undergraduate, and is thinking about doing the same in Idaho Falls.

Albertson Foundation, Micron to link teachers

BOISE (AP) – Micron Technology Inc. and the J.A. & Kathryn Albertson Foundation are joining in development of an Internet-based video conferencing network for Idaho teachers.

Micron Internet Services, a division of Micron Technology, will install the system linking 15 classrooms in Idaho to help with technology training for teachers.

'We are providing the technical nuts and bolts getting these classrooms hooked up for video conference.'

–Todd Chavez, Micron marketing manager

The video conferencing outlets are part of an $80 million initiative by the Albertson Foundation to beef up technology in Idaho public schools, foundation spokeswoman Chris Latter said.

"We are providing the technical nuts and bolts getting these classrooms hooked up for video conference," said Todd Chavez, Micron Internet Services' marketing manager. "Albertsons is providing the funds."

Video conference will help train more than 900 teachers over the next few months on using computers in their curriculum.

The foundation project is the first time Micron Internet Services has installed a video conferencing network so large. It hopes to expand its work into other areas.

"It's certainly a demonstration of the type of project we would like to be involved with in education, corporations or hospital organizations," Chavez said.

Sandy water tests grit on Washington town

WEST RICHLAND, Wash.(AP) – It's been three weeks since Jim Eggers has had a truly clean shower, and his patience is waning.

"Want to feel my hair?" the 57-year-old asked as he ran his fingers through graying locks that had been washed in gritty water.

Sand in drinking water is clogging plumbing fixtures and turning bath tubs into sand boxes at hundreds of homes in this town of about 4,000.

Officials have traced the problem to the city's No. 3 well, which is drawing in sand. But they can't say for sure when the water will clear up.

"We're optimistic that it will clean up (and) the worst is over," said Dennis Wright, West Richland public works director.

But he added, "There's absolutely no way to predict when it will quit."

"We recommend people put drinking water in a pitcher and put it in the fridge and just let the sand settle," said Jeff Johnson, of the state Department of Health's district drinking-water division in Spokane.

Eggers, who lives in a mobile home park, has more problems than just gritty hair.

He buys bottled water to drink and to bathe his 84-year-old invalid father because he fears the contaminated water could irritate his father's bed sores.

It's the second time in four years that sand has surfaced in West Richland's water.

Residents in Eggers' mobile home park and two neighborhoods complained in spring 1995 after the No. 3 well began drawing sand. An increase in pressure and volume apparently was the cause.

The city then installed equipment to trap sand and flush it into a nearby pond.

"This well has been pretty dependable until now," Wright said. "For some reason, this year we just got a glob of sand. It's got to be coming up from the bottom, and it's more than our sand trap can handle."

Since the sand returned, crews have adjusted the well's sand trap to remove the debris every two minutes, rather than the usual rate of every 10 to 15 minutes.

BIG SKY, Mont. (AP) – America's national parks grew up around the automobile. Whereas trains brought only the affluent to the national parks, the car allowed for affordable travel and freedom of choice for the masses.

But with the cars also came problems, and now managers of the national refuges are finding that traffic is aging the natural jewels beyond their years.

All are the result of more than 70 years of focusing visits to national parks around the automobile, according to park managers and transportation experts who gathered here earlier this month for a conference on transportation alternatives and technology for use in national parks.

"We don't have too many people," said Jim Tuck, the transportation director for Grand Canyon National Park. "We have too many cars."

About 200 people attended the conference, organized by the Western Transportation Institute at Montana State University. Many agreed that the challenge facing the park system is to strike a balance between making parks accessible to visitors while preserving the natural resources that people come to see in the first place.

Glacier National Park, which is dealing with repairs of Going to the Sun Road, and Yellowstone National Park are facing many of the same issues as other parks in the country. "Roads and potholes are almost as famous as our bison," said Yellowstone Superintendent Marv Jensen.

Parking in Yellowstone can be scarce and on some roads during peak season, traffic flow can be reduced to near gridlock. With more than 4 million people expected to visit Yellowstone in the year 2015, Yellowstone chief planner John Sacklin said park officials are seriously looking at how visitors are moved in and around the park.

Nationally, the Park Service is moving toward increasing public transit systems. In 1996, President Clinton issued a directive to improve public transportation in the parks and a year later the secretaries of transportation and the interior signed an agreement to develop a comprehensive plan toward that end.

Getting people out of their cars will reduce pollution and preserve open space while preventing the development sprawl just outside of parks that often comes with heavy traffic, said Helen Knoll of the Federal Transit Administration.

As part of the agreement, five national parks were targeted for pilot projects which include a free propane bus service in Maine's Acadia National Park, a proposed shuttle bus service in Zion National Park and a light rail and shuttle system proposed for the south rim of Grand Canyon National Park.

Of the 378 areas managed by the Park Service, about 50 use some form of public transportation, according to a 1996 study. About half were surface transportation, such as bus or rail, and half were ferries. Just more than half of the systems were managed by park officials but owned and operated by contract with private companies.

There are several keys to making a park transit system work, said Kevin Percival, a transportation designer for the Park Service in Denver.

The system cannot be utilitarian. The design must allow visitors to see the sites, using large windows or open tops – he showed a slide of the historic "Jammer" buses in Glacier as an example.

There must be spontaneity, the ability to stop and look at bears and wolves, for example. The system must allow for the trappings of tourists such as large backpacks and bikes.

And the ride should be affordable. "These are truly public parks and we need to keep prices down," Percival said.

Yellowstone's sheer size, the number of attractions and entrances make the possibility of a park-wide bus system unlikely, Sacklin said. Large parking lots on the edges of the parks would be unpopular. And many of the successful bus systems in parks are loop systems, meaning you come out the same way you went in and often spend the night outside the park – however, that is not the way Yellowstone visitors prefer to vacation.

A 1990 Yellowstone transportation study found that 75 percent of visitors came in one entrance and left through another and stayed two nights in Yellowstone. Because of that, Sacklin said Yellowstone officials are thinking of offering public transportation in small increments, such as a shuttle system from Grant Village that would stop at geyser basins and trailheads. Or working with gateway communities to encourage people to leave their cars at motels or campgrounds and take a bus into the park.

There is nothing in her simple dress and quiet manner to indicate she is one of America's most promising, young jazz vocal talents. There is nothing to tell of her voice – a voice made of melted butter and brown sugar mixed with strong whiskey and served hot.

The mellow timbres ebbing from Miller's small frame have earned her three medals at the Lionel Hampton Jazz Festival. Recently, she received the outstanding vocalist award in Downbeat magazine's national Young Musicians Awards.

"I still have so much to learn and a long way to go," she said.

Miller grew up around music her entire life. Her father, Robert Miller, is a saxophonist and music professor at the University of Idaho. Rebecca Alexander, her mother, who is now a psychologist, has taught high school music courses.

Miller's family moved to the Palouse when she was 5 years old. She soon fell in love with the jazz festival and with jazz.

"Jazz is the last real music. It hasn't been affected by the media yet," she said.

She said she enjoyed meeting Lionel Hampton and other jazz greats as a little girl.

Miller started singing with her mother and along with children's compact discs, such as "The Little Mermaid" soundtrack when she was three.

In eighth grade, Miller, who has never had a voice lesson, decided she wanted to compete in the jazz festival. Miller was an immediate success and won her division in her first year of competition.

"I don't know where she gets it all," Robert Miller said. "She is very driven and practices an awful lot. I don't remember what I was doing at 17, but it wasn't anything like this."

Today, Miller not only sings along to her favorite musicians' recordings, she sings with the musicians themselves.

After she took first place in the high school soprano division at this year's jazz festival, Miller had a chance to meet with jazz greats Evelyn White and Diana Krall. White listened to her sing and made suggestions on how to improve and Krall offered her advice.

"She told me it was really important to learn to accompany myself on the piano so that if, say, my drummer is sick or my bassist runs off, I can still perform," Miller said.

Miller is taking Krall's advice to heart this summer and learning to play the piano. She said meeting with these artists backstage has "opened doors" for her.

PHS seniors must complete a project on top of their other course work in order to graduate. Miller had wanted to compile her work on a CD for a long time so she decided to tie it in to the project.

School – and verdict – are out

First year of bilingual education leaves questions unanswered

SAN JOSE, Calif. (AP) – Shrieking with laughter, the children race around the playing field, gleefully soaking classmates and teachers alike as the green grass under their feet takes on a slick patina of mud.

"Mas agua! (More water!)," they yell, barely recognizable as the crisply dressed youngsters who filed into class last fall for their first year under Proposition 227, California's anti-bilingual education law.

As Sherman Oaks Elementary ends the year with a traditional water fight, the children of Sandra Villarreal's class have reason to celebrate: They're passing first grade.

The verdict's still out on Proposition 227. "It's probably too early to tell," says state schools chief Delaine Eastin. "I'm sure it's safe to say those at either extreme, those who predicted extreme failure and disasters or those who predicted complete success and total transformation, may be disappointed."

Proposition 227, which passed in June 1998, junked California's 30-year-old system of bilingual education and replaced it with one year of English immersion.

As it turned out, that wasn't the last word on bilingual education.

Some school districts interpreted the instructions to teach "nearly all" in English as meaning 30 percent in Spanish was OK, while thousands of parents exercised a loophole allowing them to put their children back in bilingual programs.

Still, many bilingual classes were scrapped, leading to the third big development – reports by teachers in Southern California, home to the bulk of the state's old bilingual programs, that English immersion students were learning to read and even write.

This month, the district of Oceanside, near San Diego, released test scores showing a marked improvement. Last year's limited-English second-graders, for instance, scored in the 12th percentile (meaning they scored as well or better than only 12 percent of the national sample). This year's second-graders were in the 24th percentile.

Ron Unz, the software millionaire who coauthored Proposition 227, says Oceanside is an excellent benchmark because all bilingual education was eliminated for the more than 4,000 limited-English speakers. "I can't think of any education reform anyone's ever performed that has produced results that quickly," he says.

The scores don't track individual students or account for other reforms, such as Oceanside's revised curriculum.

But, says district spokeswoman Cindy Sabato, "there is something to be said for Proposition 227."

"He pushed me. And I wasn't teasing," he declares, his English coming readily even though Vietnamese is his first language.

But for a spelling test, Trana is at a loss for words, chewing on his pencil and tapping a Superhero sneaker on the floor before scrawling "wan" for "when," and "bgoib," for "drive."

Trana is in English immersion because the school only offers bilingual education in Spanish. (According to the state Education Department, only 30 percent of limited-English speakers were ever in full bilingual education.)

Bilingual experts say students like Trana are an example of what's wrong with English immersion; students pick up "playground English," but miss what's happening in the classroom.

Idaho teachers take on distance, class size to teach Spanish

LEWISTON (AP) – They watched each other learn Spanish each day but had never met, separated by miles of rural prairie and the rolling hills of the Palouse.

The 35 students from Potlatch, Deary and Prairie high schools gazed at each other over burritos and virgin margaritas recently. They pointed out familiar faces, class clowns and argued about who looked fatter on TV.

"We were excited to meet them," said Ashley Bogar, 14, of Deary. "We've been with them all year."

They all took "Introduction to the Spanish Language and Culture" through an interactive video and came together for the first time at Casa de Oro in Lewiston.

This is the long-distance language program's first year. It is funded by a grant from Lewis-Clark State College, which provided the hardware and technical upkeep.

"I thought it was important to meet face to face," said Tim Jones, the Potlatch High School Spanish teacher who instructed the three schools from his televised classroom.

"I'd never recognize some of them because of the resolution on the screen."

Many of the students discussed the challenge of learning through a televised class, even an interactive one.

"You need the one-on-one with the teacher to be able to comprehend what he's trying to tell you," said 15-year-old Justin Doty of Deary. Another complaint was 35 students is too many.

"You can't ask every question you have because there are three schools there," explained Doty.

"It was frustrating for the kids. They don't know the teacher and he doesn't know them," said Ross. "That really hurts a lot I think. But there are so many and he has his own individual students in front of him."

Equipment failures and different school schedules often canceled the Spanish class.

"I don't think they're at a place they should be," said Ross of the students' Spanish abilities.

"With three classrooms full of students, to call on them with any consistency or regularity is pretty hard," explained Jones, who is thinking up strategies to get as many students as possible to speak next year.

"The biggest thing is three small communities have been able to pool resources and provide a language education program, whereas in the past it would be hard for any one individual school to justify hiring a foreign language teacher."

Deary High School has a French teacher but not a Spanish teacher. Potlatch has a Spanish teacher but no French teacher.

Long-distance programs like this give small schools, which wouldn't have a ghost of a chance, more resources, Jones said.

Technology didn't stop students from playing pranks when the teacher's back was turned.

"Testosterone works long-distance," Jones said, laughing.

Long-distance flirting went on with students flashing signs to the camera for their TV friends. There was also dancing for the camera and teasing rivals about sports victories.

Jones provides the curriculum. Class begins with students and aides at the three high schools gathering simultaneously. Televised visuals switch from Jones speaking to projections of lessons to students when they speak into their microphones.

Quizzes and tests are faxed to the schools. More complicated tests are mailed to Jones to grade.

The technology allowed Prairie High's aide, Barb Jones, to air a video of a bullfight she filmed in Mexico over spring break for not only her eight students in Cottonwood, but for all three classes at once.

Next year, first- and second-level Spanish will be offered through the long-distance education program. Meeting in real life will have a higher priority.

IN BRIEF

TF AA drops pair in Washington

PASCO, Wash. – The Twin Falls Cowboys' two-week road swing got off to a rocky start in Washington's Tri-Cities area Thursday and Friday, with the AA American Legion team dropping its first two games at the annual Pasco Invitational Tournament.

The Cowboys dropped a 7-2 decision to the Nampa Chiefs on Day 1 – perhaps losing pitcher Eric Rambo for the summer in the process – then found themselves run-ruled Friday, 15-4, by the Kennewick Bandits.

Rambo, pitching the first day, heard a pop in his shoulder midway through the first inning and left the game. Zack Gregersen and Tyler Warburton followed on the mound, allowing the Chiefs to score in all but the second inning. Casey McLimans was Cowboys' the lone bright spot at the plate, reaching base three times with two hits and a walk.

"We're just kind of day to day," said Twin Falls assistant coach Matt Rasmussen. "We don't know if it's anything serious, or if he just cranked it."

With the temperature threatening to break 100 degrees, Dillon Mayes homered Sean Pohlman across the plate in the first inning of Friday's game against Kennewick, but things cooled off from there. Bandit Jeremy McKereghan drove three runs home with an early-inning shot, then iced his team's win in the fifth inning with a towering grand slam.

Five Cowboy errors didn't help Twin Falls' cause.

"We made the plays," Rasmussen said. "Then we didn't know where to throw the ball."

Twin Falls is back in action today at noon against Walla Walla before taking the field in Pasco a final time on Sunday. After that, the team travels to Coeur d'Alene to play Post Falls in a doubleheader on Monday at North Idaho College before trekking into Canada for a week.

TWIN FALLS – The Twin Falls Municipal Golf Course will be closed on June 28 until 3 p.m. as course caretakers will be spraying for grubs.

Wolverines win Knaup title

Shoshone, Jerome and Twin Falls also end with victories

By Jeff Rosen
Times-News writer

SHOSHONE – Credit the spider that bit Zach Henage.

A day after getting bit by an uppity arachnid while lying in the grass, Henage pitched a complete-game victory Saturday over Marsh Falls for Indians at the Clay Knaup Invitational Tournament.

"It was the spider bite," Henage said, lifting his shirt to display a reddened welt on his side. After smiling for a moment following his team's 8-4 win, he also credited his teams toughness.

"I think we played our hearts out today," he said. "It's a nice way to finish up."

As children shagged foul balls for 50 cents and the sun warmed the field, Shoshone coach Tony Bozzuto called the tournament a success – and not just because his team ended with a win.

The Clay Knaup memorializes the Shoshone High School student killed in a tragic automobile accident in 1996. Knaup's younger brother played for the Indians Saturday, going 2-for-4 at the plate.

"His memory lives on," Bozzuto said. "Clay was a good player and a great kid. All the kids liked him."

In other games, Wood River captured the overall championship, beating Eagle 15-10, Jerome relinquished an early lead but nipped Kimberly 14-13 in a game that came down to a controversial out at home, and Twin Falls beat up on Pocatello 9-0.

Wood River first baseman Brandon Bush tags Eagle base runner Sean Hausman, who was caught off base in the first inning of the Clay Knaup Invitational American Legion championship baseball game Saturday in Shoshone. Wood River won the title 15-10.

Eagle drew first blood, scoring two runs on a Chad Scott triple to start the game, but the Vipers' lead was short-lived.

Brandon Bush tripled, Eagle pitcher Charlie Hurlberg walked a run home with the bases loaded, Cam Lloyd singled and Wood River answered with four quick runs in the bottom of the inning. Both teams went scoreless in the second, but Wood River added six more in the third, running through the order.

Those bats cooled.

The Vipers chipped away at Wood River's 10-2 lead with one run in the fourth and another in the fifth, then took a sledgehammer to it with six runs in the sixth to tie. After Wood River reliever Jesse Sheue nailed an Eagle base runner in the head with a pick-off attempt to second base, outfielder Matt Zachary – who is being courted by the Kansas City Royals as a pitcher – came on to end the onslaught.

Crashes dominate races at Speedway

By Kevin Hall
Times-News writer

TWIN FALLS - Caution was the buzzword Saturday at Magic Valley Speedway as numerous yellow flags flew during the night.

"The fans seem to really be enjoying it," said race director Randy Kerr. "It's probably some of the most action ... that we've seen in a long time here at the Speedway."

More Speedway – C3

Beyond the yellows, black warning flags were steadily waved at drivers while tow trucks, the NAPA Auto Parts truck and an ambulance made their presence felt as well.

An eerie haze of white dust hung over the track during most of the last 10 laps of the Mountain Dew Modifieds race, due to all of the broken cars, crashes and spinouts that occurred throughout the night – at least eight in all – producing quite a bit of spilled oil.

The Super stocks were the epitome of the evening's delays as seven yellow flags were

Stewart takes lead in U.S. Open

The Associated Press

PINEHURST, N.C. – Par had only one peer Saturday in the U.S. Open.

Fighting to hang on by the seat of his knickers, Payne Stewart birdied the last hole after a long, punishing day on Pinehurst No. 2 to finish the third round as the only player under par.

Stewart wound up with a 72 for 1-under 209, and will take the lead into the final round of the U.S. Open for the second straight year.

He had a four-stroke lead at The Olympic Club before stumbling to a 74 and losing to Lee Janzen. This may be even more difficult.

"I've wanted this opportunity," Stewart said. "And now I've got to go out and deal with it."

Phil Mickelson bogeyed three straight holes starting on No. 15, but he managed to apply the brakes just in time. His 5-foot birdie putt on the 18th gave him a 73 and put him one stroke back at even-par 210.

Perhaps the most dangerous player on Pinehurst is Tiger Woods, who put on a spectacular display of shotmaking and, more importantly, patience. Woods was 3 over after only two holes, but played the last 16 holes in 1 under to finish with a 72 for 211.

"I definitely don't want to play another nine," Woods said after a 72. "I'm so worn out."

Woods will be paired with Tim Herron, who had one birdie, one bogey and 16 hard-earned pars in a round of 70 that also left him just two strokes behind.

David Duval, who was tied at 3 under with Mickelson and Stewart to start the round, dropped five shots over six holes on the front, but closed with 10 straight pars for a 75. He was just three strokes back at 212, along with Steve Stricker and Vijay Singh.

"I'm going to enter the final day three shots behind the leader, and not many people between us," Duval said. "I probably can't shoot much better than par tomorrow, maybe 1 under. But I think I'm pretty close to sitting on the winning score right now."

Stricker was the only player to break par at Pinehurst No. 2, thanks to a 40-foot birdie putt on No. 2 and the most spectacular shot of the day, an 8-iron from the bunker on No. 3 that spun back into the cup for an eagle 2.

Cloud cover that moved in before the leaders teed off and occasional sprinkles provided a small dose of moisture, but not enough to contend with pin placements that were tucked on ledges of the domed greens designed by Donald Ross.

More than one player did a little jig just at the sight of their ball staying on the green. Herron, also known as "Lumpy," actually jogged to the 13th after his putt from 30 yards away stopped close to the hole.

Stars and Sabres tied after first overtime

The Associated Press

BUFFALO, N.Y. – The Dallas Stars and Buffalo Sabres extended their classic Stanley Cup finals Game 6 into yet another period, heading into the third overtime tied 1-1 Saturday night.

The Stars, holding a 3-2 lead in the best-of-7 series, were one victory away from winning the first Cup in franchise history. The Sabres needed to win to stave off elimination and send the series back to Dallas for a Game 7 on Tuesday night.

The Sabres outshot the Stars 6-4 in an overtime period that featured fewer scoring chances, but the same kind of hard hitting and exciting play that distinguished the first three periods. The teams tightened up positionally, grudgingly giving up space on the ice.

The teams went nearly eight minutes into overtime without a shot before the Sabres finally got one off at Ed Belfour.

It was typical for these teams, who entered the game with just 18 goals between them over the first five games – the lowest total since the 1954 series between Detroit and Montreal.

Saturday night's game featured some great goaltending with Belfour making 37 saves and Buffalo's Dominik Hasek 29 through the four periods.

Jere Lehtinen scored a first-period goal for Dallas and Buffalo's Stu Barnes had one in the second for the game's only scoring through four periods.

Sabres defenseman Darryl Shannon was hanging all over Lehtinen when he skated in deep down the left side and shoveled the puck at Hasek, who uncharacteristically let it bounce off his leg and into the net at 8:09.

Hasek didn't come out to challenge, but stayed back in his net to leave just enough of an opening for the puck to squeeze through.

There were no penalties in the first period, marking the first finals without a penalty in a period since the third overtime of the last game of the Colorado-Florida series in 1996.

The Sabres outshot the Stars 32-26 in regulation, reversing a series trend that had seen Dallas hold a 149-98 shot advantage in the first five games. The Sabres' 26 shots in the first 40 minutes exceeded their one-game best of 24 in Game 1 of the series which went into overtime.

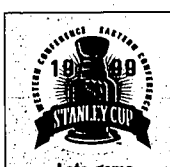
The Sabres had averaged just 5.6 shots a period for the previous 10 periods before Saturday night.

The first five games between Dallas and Buffalo were intense and closely contested, but the series took on a different perspective when Buffalo's Mike Peca called the Stars a dirty team after Game 5.

That game ended in a scuffle that cost the Sabres the services of Rhett Warrener, one of their more reliable and physical defenseman. Warrener, who broke an ankle while wrestling with Dallas defenseman Derian Hatcher, was replaced by Shannon.

The series has featured tough defense and low scoring, with the teams either tied or a goal apart for all but 5:05 of the first five games.

The Sabres were in the same position in the 1975 Stanley Cup finals, their only other appearance in the championship round.



Late game

Saturday's NHL Finals Game 6 was tied 1-1 after two overtimes as The Times-News went to press. Look for a wrapup on Game 6 in Monday's paper.

Herald tapped the ball down the third-base line – Harper contended the ball glanced off Herlad's shoe – and was tossed.

Eagle's fourth pitcher, Andrew Hall, inherited the bases loaded – and walked the final two runs home before striking out the final two he faced.

"We just had a lapse there for awhile when I put our subs in," Nelson said. "I almost blew it this time."

Wood River plays Burley Monday, Pocatello Tuesday and Shoshone next Saturday.

"We had a real bad game (Friday) losing to Twin," Nelson said. "Maybe now we've turned and we're coming back up again."

Jerome 14, Kimberly 13

Kimberly opened the scoring in the third inning on a pair of passed balls that made it 2-0, but Jerome jumped for nine runs in the bottom of the inning and made it 13-2 in the fourth on another scoring barrage.

Run rule on the way? Think again.

Kimberly, at the tournament with just 10 players, awoke for two runs in the sixth, posted eight in the sixth on a series of Jerome fielding errors, then held Jerome at bay for a scoreless bottom half of the frame. Kimberly's Jake Williams blasted an RBI triple in the seventh to pull within one and bring the tying run to 90 feet from home, but Williams was thrown out on a close play at the plate.

"Our No. 8 hitter's up there, their guy had a slow delivery, and the worst thing that could happen is that he'll get thrown out," said Kimberly coach Terry Bohan. "It was a gamble. We lost."

Jerome coach Jeremiah Johnston was pleased with the win and sympathetic at the same time.

"We came out and played hard," Johnston said. "We jumped on them quick, but we relaxed. Kimberly, they're a good ball club. That's a tough way to lose a game."

Shoshone 8, Marsh Falls 4

Marsh Falls romped to a 4-1 advantage after four innings, but the tide turned in the fifth. After holding the visitors scoreless in the frame, the Indians ignited for a decisive five-run rally.

J-2 Madson, Mike McHargue, Jeff Morgan and Shawn Stevenson keyed the outburst, but it was Stevenson's performance – he finished the afternoon 2-for-3 with a double – that tickled Bozzuto the most.

"He's just been on fire the last couple of games," Bozzuto said.

The loss was bitter for Marsh Falls pitcher Christian Colonel, one of only three holdovers from last season's highly successful group.

"It's been frustrating this year," he said. "It's a rebuilding season."

Twin Falls 9, Pocatello 0

Sean Bernhard and Brandon Hemingway combined for seven innings of two-hit ball, holding the Pocatello Rebels at bay for the duration of a rout that gave the Class A Cowboys an even 2-2 record to close out the tourney.

One day after Twin Falls upset Wood River, Bernhard worked the first four innings, and the young Cowboys didn't commit an error scoring in all but the seventh to seal the win.

"Sean pitched well," said Cowboys coach Brad Vickhammer. "What I told the kids after was that fundamentally we did everything right today. Things seem to be going our way right now."

The momentum boost comes at a most opportune time. While their AA counterparts trek through Canada this week, the Class A Cowboys (2-3 in league) play three conference games – Monday-Tuesday host Jerome, and Tuesday they play a doubleheader at Shoshone.

"It was an even game all around," Vickhammer said. "It was just a fun game to coach. We got out of there 2-2, and we feel good about that."

Speedway

prompted through only half of the race's running with seven of the 24 cars having been eliminated as a result.

A heavy toll of damaged cars filled the pits during the free press. Highlights included Brett Thompson's broken, spark-shooting No. 17 Modified biting the wall, Dan Hedlund's bent No. 99 Modified, Jason Newhouse's No. 26 Western Custom Truck with a crunched hood and Pony driver Todd Audet leaving his driver's side door out on the dangerous Turn 4.

"Normally we don't have (problems) like tonight," Kerr said. "Usually the motor will blow up and it will be an instant deal. It's pretty unusual, but it's just kind of (what goes around) in racing."

Miami, Morris win College World Series

OMAHA, Neb. (AP) – For all his trips to the College World Series, Miami coach Jim Morris never had a national title.

Kevin Brown and Michael Neu took care of that, and the janitors in Coral Gables, Fla., won't be using this year's trophy to prop open the bathroom door.

Brown homered in the second inning and hit a three-run double in Miami's five-run fifth, leading the Hurricanes to a 6-5 victory over Florida State Saturday in the championship game of the College World Series.

It was the third national championship for Miami (50-13) but the first for Morris, the only coach in NCAA history to bring his team to Omaha each of his first six seasons.

"It was a great win for all of us," Brown said. "Coach has been here the last six years. It's great to finally get it out of the way, and I'm just glad I could do my part."

Since he arrived in Coral Gables, Morris has lived in the shadow of former coach Ron Fraser, who won titles in 1982 and 1985.

Morris also has been haunted for three years by the memory of a ninth-inning homer by LSU's Warren Morris. The Hurricanes were one out away from the 1996 title when Morris lifted the Tigers to a 9-8 victory.

"It's a huge monkey off my back," the Miami coach said. "I've thought about it thousands and thousands of times."

Morris has been asked time and again about that game, by everyone from reporters to professors to the diners at the civic luncheons in Miami.

"I've got to admit it, sometimes I had a very, very difficult time answering. I don't think anyone understands how difficult it was to handle. It was crushing," Morris said.

Garciaparra solos in Red Sox win

BOSTON (AP) – Nomar Garciaparra went 3-for-3, including a solo homer and an RBI double, and Jin Ho Cho got his first major league win to lead the Boston Red Sox to a 7-4 victory over the Texas Rangers on Saturday.

Jose Offerman stopped his worst slump of the season, going 3-for-5 and driving in a run, and Mike Stanley added a solo home run as the Red Sox won for just the fifth time in their last 14 games.

American League

Todd Zeile had a three-run homer and Ivan Rodriguez had a solo shot for Texas, which lost for just the ninth time in its last 38 games.

Cho (1-0), a 23-year-old Korean, gave up five hits and four runs in six-plus innings.

Mark Clark (3-7) gave up four runs and seven hits in just 1 1-3 innings in the loss.

Indians 10, Mariners 6

CLEVELAND – Roberto Alomar and Manny Ramirez hit back-to-back homers in Cleveland's five-run fourth inning and Dave Burba pitched seven solid innings.

David Justice and Jacob Cruz added two-run homers for the Indians, who have scored 10 runs or more 13 times this season and are on pace to break the 1931 New York Yankees' record for runs in a season.

Ken Griffey Jr. hit his 26th homer and Butch Huskey also homered for the Mariners, who had their four-game winning streak snapped.

Burba (7-2) allowed five runs and nine hits to win for the fifth time in six decisions.

Blue Jays 7, Royals 0

TORONTO – Tony Fernandez had two RBI singles to raise his major league-leading average to .409 and Roy Halladay allowed just two hits over 6 2-3 innings.

Fernandez, who went 2-for-4, got his 2,177th career hit to tie Julio Franco for most hits by a Dominican player.

Kevin Appier (6-6), who has lost his last four starts, pitched five shutout innings of one-hit ball, before allowing three runs in the sixth and three more in the seventh.

Athletics 13, Tigers 1

Matt Stairs and Jason Giambi also homered for the A's, who snapped a four-game losing streak with only their third win in their last 16 road games.

Luis Polonia was 4-for-5 with two bunt singles for Detroit, which has lost four of five.

Devil Rays 4, Twins 3

MINNEAPOLIS – Jose Canseco hit his major league-leading 27th homer and Wade Boggs had his 1,000th career RBI.

Canseco has homered in 13 consecutive series to tie Roger Maris for the second-longest streak ever in the American League. Maris homered in 13 straight in 1961 and Mark McGwire homered in 20 straight for Oakland in 1996.

Bryan Rekar (5-3) pitched a season-high 7 2-3 strong innings for Tampa Bay, which won for just the fifth time in 25 games.

Yankees 6, Angels 2

NEW YORK – Batting second in manager Joe Torre's revamped lineup, Bernie Williams homered and doubled twice and caught nine fly balls.

That all added up to a victory Saturday as the New York Yankees sent the struggling Anaheim Angels to their sixth straight loss.

"I think Joe is just trying to juggle things around, and this lineup seems to be working really good," Williams said. "I think he'll stick with it awhile."

O's 11, White Sox 9, 11 Innings

CHICAGO – Mike Bordick hit a two-run homer in the 11th inning as the Baltimore Orioles survived a shaky performance by their bullpen.

The Orioles got go-ahead homers from Harold Baines in the eighth inning and Will Clark in the 10th, but they weren't enough as the White Sox kept finding ways to come back.

Mac is back on home run track

ST. LOUIS (AP) – Mark McGwire ended a 32 at-bat home run drought with a three-run shot in the first inning as the St. Louis Cardinals beat the New York Mets 7-6 Saturday.

McGwire had been 5-for-30 with one RBI in the first eight games of a 13-game homestand before victimizing Jason Isringhausen (1-2) for his 20th homer on a 3-2 pitch, a towering drive over the center-field wall. He's exactly one month off his record 70-homer pace of last season, when he hit No. 20 on May 19 and had 33 homers on June 19.

National League

Mike Piazza extended his hitting streak to a career-best 22 games with a two-run homer in the fifth for the Mets, who have lost only three of their last 13 games. Piazza, batting .355 (33-for-93) during the streak, is two games shy of the team record set by Hubie Brooks in 1984.

Manny Aybar (3-1) allowed two hits in four scoreless innings for the victory.

Dodgers 8, Phillies 1

LOS ANGELES, Calif. – Darren Dreifort pitched 6 2-3 strong innings and Todd Hollandsworth, Tripp Cromer and Raul Mondesi each drove in two runs.

Dreifort (6-5) stopped a personal three-game losing streak by blanking the Phillies until Scott Rolen's RBI single with two outs in the sixth.

He allowed one run and six hits in 6 2-3 innings as the Dodgers won for only the fifth time in 19 games this month.

Robert Person (0-1), in his third start of the season, went four innings and allowed five hits and three runs – one earned – with two walks and one strikeout.

Giants 11, Cubs 5

SAN FRANCISCO – Marvin Benard had a career-high five RBIs, hitting a two-run homer and a three-run double, for San Francisco's third straight victory over Chicago.

Charlie Hayes and Doug Mirabelli added two RBIs each and Barry Bonds had an RBI single for the Giants, who won their fourth straight. The Cubs, who left the bases loaded twice, have lost nine of 10.

Shawn Estes (4-4) got the win despite walking seven in 5 2-3 innings, giving him a major league-worst 59 walks this season. He allowed four runs on three hits.

Brewers 10, Reds 1

Ron Villone (1-2), who walked four of the first eight batters he faced in his last start, retired only one of the seven he pitched to Saturday. His ERA in three starts is 10.80.

Rick Greene, a 28-year-old right-hander who spent six years in the minors, made his major league debut in relief of Villone and gave up a three-run homer to Valentin, the first batter he faced, for a 7-0 lead.

Astros 5, Expos 2

HOUSTON – Mike Hampton allowed two runs in seven innings and had two hits of his own to lead the Astros Saturday night.

Hampton (9-2) allowed seven hits and two walks to win his fourth straight start. He is 4-0 with 3.62 ERA in June.

Hampton, who was 2-for-2 with a run scored, tripled to center to lead off the fifth. He scored the Astros' fourth run when Montreal third baseman Michael Barrett misplayed Craig Biggio's grounder for an error.

Rockies 10, Marlins 2

DENVER – Todd Helton became the third player in Colorado history to hit for the cycle, getting it in his only four at-bats.

Helton, 13-for-26 with four homers and 17 RBIs in his last seven games, doubled in the second inning, singled in the fourth, hit a solo homer in the fifth and tripled to lead off the seventh.

He joins Dante Bichette and Neifi Perez as the other Colorado players to hit for the cycle. San Francisco's Jeff Kent accomplished the feat earlier this season.

Quale cements his points lead

By Kevin Hall

TWIN FALLS - The racing was hot on Magic Valley Speedway's sun-baked oval Saturday as a full night of NASCAR Winston Racing Series action took place.

On the track were the feature-division Mountain Dew Modifieds, Western Custom Trucks, Budweiser Street stocks and NAPA Auto Parts Pony stocks.

Quale takes wreck-filled race

Lap 1 ended with a bang and that proved to be a portent of events to come in the featured division Mountain Dew Modifieds race won by points leader Bruce Quale.

"Boy, that was exciting," Quale said. "I'm glad I was at the front and avoided those melees."

The melees produced three yellow flags as cars were leaving the 10-car field as fast as Quale was tallying laps.

On the opening lap, Brett Thompson tried to squeeze his No. 17 underneath the No. 33 of Dana Pruett, and as he maneuvered near the front straightaway wall he bumped the rear end of Pruett and slammed into the wall underneath the starter's tower, sending a shower of sparks into the dusky night.

"I thought there was a hole there and tried to take it pretty wide and it didn't work," Thompson said, as his crew frantically worked to put the busted car back together.

So good were they that the Jerome driver returned to complete the race's last six laps. When racing resumed with the loud pops of the cars' exhausts filling the air, Bruce Quale regained the lead and zoomed far ahead of the pack.

His overwhelming lead lasted only for a dozen laps before all hell broke loose in Turn 4 as Harold "The Terminator" Wartluft tied up with Steve Jones and Doug Dugger, producing a three-car blockade. Dan Hedlund didn't see the pileup and smashed into the group, sending Hedlund into the infield and Jones into the pits for the night. A shaken Hedlund walked away shortly afterward.

Lynch wins second race

Burley driver Nick Lynch ran away from the rest of the competition Saturday as his Mr. Gas No. 8 gassed the field en route to his second win of the year.

"Oh man, (my crew) did something after the heat race because that was just perfect," the 17-year-old said. "Earlier on, it was pushing a lot. Whatever they did, it was awesome."

The caution-filled race that saw the yellow flag fly three times during the 35-lap main event, was dominated by the youngster after grabbing the lead from Spokane, Wash., driver Dick Cox on Lap 10.

From there, Lynch was in control, and although the No. 99 of Randy Hadlock tried to make a race of it, Lynch was much too strong.

The many yellows were only a distraction – with the biggest being Buhl's Dan Pehrson and Twin Falls' Jason Newhouse providing the large crowd with a thrill in Turn 4. Pehrson had become sideways when Newhouse inadvertently plowed into the right rear quarter panel of the No. 72, sending Newhouse over the high bank and demolishing his hood. Both drivers were able to finish the race.

Kuna comes through in Street race

A flat tire and a lucky No. 18 enabled Kuna driver Don VanSchoiack to visit the winner's circle for the first time all season.

"It feels good because it's been a long time," VanSchoiack chuckled. "I just drove it or it drove me, I don't know which."

VanSchoiack's lean, green Dodge Dart has been near the front for virtually every race this season, and Saturday's main event was no different.

VanSchoiack was tailing points leader Norman Hatke and second place runner Brian Welch for 17 laps before Hatke left the track with a flat tire. On Lap 18, VanSchoiack made his move, slipping past the hot-running Welch and never looking back for the win.

Luckily the checkered flag had fallen for the mean green machine for in Turn 2 of his victory lap, VanSchoiack ran into the infield and hit a lightpole.

Caldwell Jr. wins second race

A rocky start that prompted the race's only yellow flag with a spin-out in Turn 3 turned into a smooth finish for Kimberly's David Caldwell Jr. who took his second checkered flag of the season in his Chevy Monza.

"It feels great to get my second win," Caldwell said. "I hope they keep coming and it should put me in the points lead."

Caldwell Jr., who took command of the race on Lap 16, said patience was the key to his victory.

"I just waited for Billi (Miles) to mess up and she went on the outside and I slipped in underneath her," he said. "Then I did the same thing with Ron (Revels), they both looked like they were pushing it a little bit and my car was running on rails."

Hopper takes Stallions' reins

BOISE – The Idaho Stallions have named Edwin Hopper as the team's new head coach/general manager, succeeding Dick Suess, who resigned earlier in the week after guiding the Stallions to a 4-5 start.

"I'm obviously extremely excited about the opportunity," Hopper said. "We realize we're coming in and fighting a little bit of an uphill battle. The players have been on an emotional roller coaster ride, but hopefully I can come in and provide some stability."

With the exception of Hopper, there will be no other additions to the Idaho coaching staff.

"Coach Hopper is not here to change the organization, he's here to enhance it," Idaho team owner Jim Carlson said.

The Stallions are tied for the third and final spot in the playoffs and are just a game out of second place with seven games remaining.

Bobcats will hold baseball clinic

BURLEY – The Burley Bobcat baseball clinic is scheduled for Tuesday from 9 a.m. to noon. Registration runs from 8:30-9:00 and costs $15, which includes a T-shirt.

Woods stays patient on a very difficult day

PINEHURST, N.C. (AP) – Tiger Woods was disgusted already, and his day had barely begun. A bladed chip led to an opening double bogey and he was cursing loudly to himself as he walked to the second tee.

Patience usually wins U.S. Opens, and Woods seemed ready to unravel early on Saturday.

It turned out there would be plenty of unraveling to go around on the crowned greens of Pinehurst No. 2. But it was those who managed to put themselves back together who ended up still having a chance today.

At the top of that list was Woods, who came back from a disastrous double bogey-bogey start to finish the day just where he began – two shots off the lead.

"You just have to keep patient and grind it out and make pars," Woods said. "Even though I got off to a rough start, I was very proud of the way I hung in there today."

With players struggling to make pars, the huge crowds lining the fairways and greens at Pinehurst didn't get a chance to cheer on anyone making a great run to the top of the leaderboard.

"There is a lack of birdies out there," Stricker said. "You've got to remain patient and try to make pars, and sneak in a few birdies to put some pressure on the leaders."

A Final Day on No. 5

The experts rate Pinehurst No. 2 as one of the 10 greatest courses in the world. There players must both drive the ball and hit long irons well. Wiregrass Bermuda rough along the fairway was cut down this week from 4 to 3 inches to allow easier shots to the green.

Pak clings to lead in ShopRite LPGA Classic

ABSECON, N.J. – Fighting off a shaky start, Se Ri Pak fired a 2-under par 69 Saturday to cling to the lead after two rounds of the ShopRite LPGA Classic.

Pak rallied after a double bogey on No. 6, carding four birdies en route to a two-day total of 132 – 10 under par – heading into the final round of the 54-hole event today.

Pak's opening-round 63 set a tournament record for the 6,051-yard, par-71 Seaview Marriott Resort course. But tricky wind and the disastrous performance on No. 6 held her to a 69 on Saturday.

Juli Inkster, whose round of 68 and two-day total of 134 put her two strokes back of Pak, birdied two of her first four holes and was tied with Pak at 8-under at one point.

But she bogeyed consecutive holes on the back nine and couldn't keep pace.

Defending champion Annika Sorenstam, who set an LPGA record last year with a 17-under-par 196, rallied after a sluggish opening round. She shot a 6-under 65, the lowest round Saturday, to go 5-under for the tournament, one shot behind Johnson, Lindley and Doolan.

Erika Wicoff made a hole in one. Using a 4-iron, she aced the 177-yard 14th and won a car.

Mahaffey takes one-stroke lead over senior trio

SAN ANTONIO – John Mahaffey had five birdies and an eagle in a 5-under 67 Saturday and took a one-stroke lead over three golfers after two rounds of the $1.1 million Southwestern Bell Dominion seniors tournament.

The 51-year-old Mahaffey, ranked 13th on the money list, was at 10-under 134 after two trips around the 6,835-yard course at The Dominion Country Club. Play was halted for 35 minutes in the late afternoon because of rain.

"The last two days I played pretty solid," said Mahaffey, a native of nearby Kerrville who lives at both The Woodlands and San Antonio. "I hit a lot of greens and made some very good putts."

The 1978 PGA champion, who has six top 10 finishes this year, started the day in a group of eight golfers one shot behind co-leaders Walter Hall and David Graham.

The pack in second had only three Saturday: Gil Morgan, Hugh Baiocchi and Bruce Fleisher.

Fleisher, the leading money winner on the Senior PGA Tour, has already won four tournaments in his rookie season. He had six birdies in a second-round 68.

Park hangs on in Agadir

AGADIR, Morocco – David Park, making his first start ever on the European tour, shot a four-under-par 68 to lead Sweden's Eric Carlberg by a shot going into the final round of the Moroccan Open.

The 24-year-old Welshman could become the first player since the modern European Tour was launched in 1972 to win on his first outing.

Park's had a four-shot lead with six holes to go but finished with three bogies in his last four holes.

Note: This is part of a series of stories moving each month on great sports moments this century.

The Associated Press

Gene Neher was in the right place at Cherry Hills Country Club on a warm Saturday afternoon at the 1960 U.S. Open.

As the marshal on the first hole, he watched Ben Hogan tee off in the final round only three strokes out of the lead. Like most everyone else that day, Neher believed Hogan would methodically work his way into the lead to win a fifth U.S. Open.

Paired with Hogan was a 20-year-old kid who could hit the ball a mile. Jack Nicklaus was worth watching, too, even though an amateur had not won the U.S. Open since the Depression.

Two groups later, Arnold Palmer marched defiantly to the first tee and snatched his driver from his bag, seven strokes behind and more determined than ever to drive the green on the 318-yard hole.

"He was hitching his pants and gritting his teeth," Neher said. "There weren't too many people watching because he wasn't leading. Mike Souchak was the leader. And Arnie wasn't Arnie back then."

The gallery gasped when Palmer's drive shot off into the thin air of Colorado. From where Neher was standing, he could see the ball hop out of the rough and onto the front of the green.

Those who couldn't see at least heard the news – the eruption of cheers grew louder as Palmer embarked on the greatest comeback in U.S. Open history, one of the most memorable sports moments of the century.

More than just a Palmer charge that would soon become his legacy, the 1960 U.S. Open was a convergence of three generations of golfing greatness, each charting a new trail.

For Hogan, it was the beginning of the end to a career defined by his search for perfection, and a dominance in the U.S. Open that probably will never be matched – 16 consecutive finishes in the top 10, four of them victories.

Palmer was at his peak. Cherry Hills was the third of seven major championships he won in a seven-year span. His comeback became the very essence of his hard-charging charisma that raised golf to unprecedented popularity.

And Nicklaus? The chubby young man with the crewcut gave a sneak preview of the next evolution in golf, winning 18 major championships and setting a standard against which everyone is measured.

"It brought together the three eras," Palmer said.

For three rounds, the tournament belonged to Souchak, who opened with rounds of 68 and 67 for what was then an Open record 7-under 135.

Palmer was eight strokes back going into the final two rounds – and seething. He tried to drive the first green on Thursday and double-bogeyed, but he vowed to keep trying.

THE XX CENTURY IN SPORTS

Nicklaus was at par 142 and riding high. He ran to the scoreboard to see whom he would play with for the final 36 holes Saturday, then gulped when he saw the most feared name in golf.

Hogan.

"He didn't say a lot, occasionally talked when he wanted," Nicklaus said. "But he wasn't a whole lot different than I was. I don't like to talk a whole lot and listen to a bunch of jamber, either. I like to play golf, particularly when I'm playing something I want to play well in."

Still, Hogan could be intimidating in his silence and precision. Hogan hit all 18 greens again on Saturday morning for a 69, still tied with Nicklaus and only three strokes out of the lead.

Palmer, meanwhile, bogeyed two of the last three holes Saturday morning for a 72 and was seven strokes back.

"I felt like I was playing extremely good that week and nothing was happening," Palmer said. "That was a bit of a shocker to me because my game was right where I thought it should be. Nothing happened until the last round."

The fireworks started before he drove the green. Palmer stopped for lunch between rounds when he saw Ken Venturi, Bob Drum of the Pittsburgh Press and Dan Jenkins of the Fort Worth Press.

"What if I shoot 65? Doesn't 280 always win the Open?" Palmer said.

"Yeah, when Hogan shoots it," Jenkins replied.

President of the USGA John Clock presents the U.S. Open trophy to Arnold Palmer, left, at the Cherry Hills Country Club in Denver, Colo., June 18, 1960.

Drum, who had chronicled Palmer's young career and planned to accompany him to the British Open, was even more gruff.

"He set the fire off inside, not that it wasn't there," Palmer said. "All I know is I was pretty" upset.

With that, Palmer drove the first green and made birdie, the first of four in a row to start the final round. He saw Drum and Jenkins when he reached the fifth tee.

"Fancy seeing you guys out here," he said. Palmer made the turn in 5-under 30.

Neher couldn't leave his post until the final group teed off, but it wasn't hard to find Palmer. He simply followed the cheers.

"The more birdies he made, the louder it got," Neher said. "On the 10th green, it was pandemonium. That's the only way to describe it."

Palmer birdied the 11th to get to 4 under, tied with Hogan and still one behind Nicklaus, who went out in 32 and added another birdie on No. 12.

Unlike the Nicklaus who has won the career Grand Slam three times, the amateur unraveled. He ran a 12-foot birdie putt past the hole on the 13th, and saw a loosely repaired ball mark right in his line.

"As a 20-year-old kid, I got flustered," Nicklaus said. "I had a ball mark that had been repaired, and I wasn't sure whether I could repair it. And I didn't have the presence of mind to ask. I hit the putt, and it bothered me enough to miss."

Nicklaus three-putted the 14th, missed a 3-foot birdie putt on No. 16 and an 8-foot birdie putt on the par-5 17th.

"Hogan and myself had a good opportunity to win," Nicklaus said. "We both, in many ways, gave it away."

Hogan hit 52 straight greens going back to the second round. The one he missed cost him his last chance to win.

Hogan, at a stage in his career when he froze over putts, tried to put his approach over the water on No. 17 as close as possible, feeling as though he needed a birdie to win. His wedge just cleared the water but spun back in.

Hogan calmly removed his shoes, splashed out a remarkable shot but missed the 18-foot par putt. Finally, Palmer had the lead and closed out his 65 with two pars.

"After half a beat of silence, the air around the green exploded, fractured by wild cheers and whistlers. I glanced around, took a step or two to the hole, and lifted my ball from the cup, then turned and flung my white visor toward the gallery at the back of the green."

"Don't feel sorry for me," he said. "I played with a kid today who could have won this Open by 10 shots if he had known how."

Hogan never contended in another Open. Within six years, Nicklaus joined Hogan as one of only four players to win all four majors. In 1980, he matched Hogan's four U.S. Open titles.

The driver and the ball that Palmer used for the opening shot in the final round are on display in the Eisenhower Room at Cherry Hills Country Club.

Neher, now 78, is still a member – and still remembers.

"I got to watch Arnie drive the first green," Neher said. "I got to watch Arnie become Arnie."

Spurs take two

The San Antonio Spurs grinded out an 80-67 victory over the New York Knicks in Game 2 of the NBA Finals. The victory gives the Spurs a 2-0 lead with the series headed to New York.

TURNING POINT

With the Knicks trailing by three points, Sean Elliot and Tim Duncan scored four points in 2.5 seconds to give the Spurs a 56-49 lead at the end of the third quarter. Here's a look at the two plays that changed the momentum of the game.

Spurs fans want to see sweep of Knicks

SAN ANTONIO (AP) – Somebody forgot to tell Spurs *fans that the celebrating is sup*posed to wait until the series is officially over.

From their looks early Saturday, it appeared that the Spurs already had won their first NBA title.

The euphoria over Game 2 lasted past midnight in this small-market city, with horn-honking fans descending on downtown and waving brooms out their car windows. It might have been the first 1 a.m. traffic jam in San Antonio's history.

Some of those fans were undoubtedly among the nearly 40,000 chanting "Sweep, Sweep" during the fourth quarter of San Antonio's 80-67 victory over the New York Knicks Friday night, and none of them expect the series to return here for Games 6 or 7.

After what they've saw in the first two games, it's hard to blame them.

It's not so much that the Spurs have dominated New York, it's more that the Knicks simply appear to be too small, too injured and too spent to put up a decent fight against an opponent that hasn't lost in more than five weeks.

"Playing the Knicks is not easy," David Robinson said. "They are very explosive. Those guys run all over the place, they get to the boards extremely well. I don't know what it looks like, but they're making us work very hard. They're not quitting."

Nor should the Knicks be expected to quit when the series shifts to Madison Square Garden for Game 3 Monday night, although only two teams in NBA history have come back from 2-0 deficits to win the finals, and no team ever has come back after trailing 3-0.

One obstacle the Spurs will be facing is the Knicks' knack for playing some of their best basketball when their circumstances seem most dire.

In the first round, things looked bleak for the Knicks after they failed to close out the Heat in Game 4 and had to go to Miami for Game 5. In the Eastern Conference finals, the Knicks were facing the prospect of a 3-2 deficit when they went to Indianapolis for Game 5 and pulled out the victory.

During the regular season, there were numerous times when New York turned it up a notch just when things appeared hopeless.

"We definitely are upset with ourselves," New York's Marcus Camby said. "We feel we could have came out here and got this one."

Since the NBA went to a 2-3-2 format for the finals in 1985, no home team has won all three middle games.

The Knicks will have to deal with the fact that San Antonio has played better on the road during the postseason than it has at home.

In the first three rounds of the playoffs, San Antonio averaged 96.2 points per game on the road and won by an average of 13.4 points.

U.S. wins opener for record crowd

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. (AP) – As soon as they walked onto the field, they knew Saturday would be something special. Something historic. Something unforgettable.

After the U.S. team beat Denmark 3-0 in the opener of the Women's World Cup, the players didn't want to leave the field. They wanted to soak in the atmosphere created by the biggest crowd ever to watch a women's sporting event in the United States.

"The crowd was awesome. The noise was unbelievable," Mia Hamm said of the 78,972 fans who came to celebrate women's soccer and their own team. "I think we all had goose bumps when we stepped onto the field. How could you not have goose bumps when you see the stadium filled and people chanting, 'U-S-A, U-S-A?'"

She scored a masterful goal in the 17th minute. Her passes either sprung teammates for open shots or found them in threatening positions. She created space for herself, as well.

But not until Julie Foudy converted a long cross from Hamm with 17 minutes left could the home team feel secure. Kristine Lilly scored from 18 yards in the 89th minute as the U.S. veterans led the victory.

"A team can only shut us down for so long," said goalkeeper Briana Scurry, who rarely was tested in getting her 50th career shutout. "They might slow us for a half, but they won't stop us for a full game."

A team that favors the quick strike was more methodical in wearing down the Danes. Led by Hamm's brilliant playmaking, the Americans had numerous scoring chances in the second half, as Denmark seemed to tire.

But the marksmanship wasn't there nearly all day. Cindy Parlow hit the crossbar. So did Lilly. Then Lilly missed by inches while wide open in front.

Danish goalkeeper Dorthe Larsen made a brilliant punch save on Tiffeny Milbrett as the Americans – who won the first World Cup in 1991 and took the 1996 Olympic gold medal – continued their charge.

"We dominated the game," Lilly said. "I'm glad we got those two at the end. I think it gave us a big boost going into our next game."

That will be Thursday against Nigeria in Chicago.

"We'll all remember this day," Hamm said. "With this kind of support, it's a wonderful feeling playing in front of this group."

German wins another

BOISE (AP) – Ina Teutenberg, the former three-time Junior World Champion, stood atop the podium for the second time in the HP LaserJet Women's Challenge.

She won Saturday's sprint of the next to last stage, a 45-lap criterium held on a .77- mile figure eight course in downtown Boise, in a time of 1 hour, 21 minutes and 59 seconds.

Canadian Lyne Bessette of Saturn and Jennifer McRae of Time of Austin, Texas finished second and third respectively. Jeannie Longo-Ciprelli of France finished with the field to maintain her position as the overall race leader by 3 minutes and 43 seconds over American Mari Holden of HP Toner.

Teutenberg was in an early break with one of her biggest rivals, Australia's Anna Wilson of Saturn, who started the day only four points down in the Overall Points Leader Competition. After Wilson collected enough points in the designated Hot Spot Sprint laps, claiming the red Points Leader Jersey from Holden, the break was absorbed by the field.

Today's final stage of the 12-day, 693-mile event takes the riders from Middleton to Boise's Hyde Park for a 50.6-mile road race. After the race, cycling legends Rebecca Twigg (race winner in '84-'86) and Inga Thompson ('87, '90) will be the inaugural inductees into the Women's Challenge Hall of Fame.

SATURDAY'S RESULTS

Bicycle racer has faced tougher challenges before

BOISE (AP) – Seared lungs, bursting from pedaling up a grueling 4,000-foot hill climb, don't bother Tracey Gaudry. Neither do thighs wracked with pain after 100-plus miles over the Idaho desert.

These things are nothing when you've spent two years with your insides ravaged by chemotherapy.

That's the legacy the 29-year-old Australian brought to the 1999 Hewlett-Packard LaserJet Women's Challenge.

She's a tough woman embarking on what's acknowledged to be the toughest road race in North America – for men or women.

The 693-mile, 12-day race ends today. It has seen Gaudry and the others climb 13,870 feet in pursuit of $125,000, the richest road-racing purse in North America.

Gaudry made herself a contender by overcoming seemingly impossible obstacles to win the difficult Montreal World Cup circuit in Canada. She overcame the heat, despite suffering jet lag from flying from the Tour de Bretagne stage race in France, where she finished fourth.

Given that, the Women's Challenge figured to be a breeze, especially considering that she got to Boise a week before the race.

"It's the best race in the world," Gaudry said. "It's so well organized. We know we're going to have clean showers in hotel rooms. In France, we stayed in school halls with no showers. And we had to make up our own beds."

Of course, Gaudry is happy to be anywhere, given the odds she faced 10 years ago.

She was a college student heading into final exams when she started experiencing extreme fatigue. She also noticed a lump on her neck that hadn't been there a few months earlier.

By the time exams came around, she was wracked with back pain. Her rig cage felt like it was being crushed.

Two days after exams, she was in surgery, being treated for leukemia.

Doctors gave her a 25-percent chance of making it. As a student statistician, she knew what that meant better than anyone. But she was determined to beat the disease.

"It was the most horrific change in life anyone could expect, but in my mind, I was going to make it. I figured, 'It'll take two years out of my life, and that's not fair. But I will beat this and go on.'"

Gaudry spent a month in isolation, waving at family and friends from behind the windows of her room. A catheter inserted into a hole in her chest dripped drugs into her body. Her blond hair fell out in patches, and her angular 5-foot 8-inch, 130-pound body became bloated from all the drugs she was taking.

Only once did she doubt she would live – the day she couldn't bring herself to inject drugs into her stomach one more time.

"I couldn't take it because I knew I was going to throw up in an hour. I knew how sick it was going to make me. But that day also made me realize that if I didn't make it, it would be because I didn't take the drugs.

"It's a big game with your mind. No one is forcing you to take the drugs. In the end, it was the biggest lesson I've ever learned – that at the end of the day, I'm responsible for myself."

When Gaudry finally began feeling better, after two years of treatment, she decided to treat herself to an eight-day bicycle ride across 400 miles of Australia with friends.

It would be like a stroll in the park for her today, but it was a long way for someone who had never done much athletically.

"I was so tired, but I absolutely loved it," she said. "I had been working real hard all my life and studying. And I had laid around for two whole years. I was ready to get outside with my friends and do something social."

Gaudry fell in love with bicycling. A couple of years later, in 1994, she took up racing.

Now, she races part of the year. She spends the rest of the year with her husband at home in Australia, where she works part time for a personnel research company, analyzing working habits and stress levels.

Grass tennis is dull? This year's Wimbledon could be

Sure, there's always the threat of rain. And Wimbledon remains susceptible to criticism that lawn tennis is duller than watching grass courts grow, especially on the men's side.

But this year the tournament coincides with a sudden upswing in the sport's popularity, the result of two dramatic, emotional finals at the French Open earlier this month.

Wimbledon opens Monday with the focus on five-time champion Pete Sampras, who seeks a record-tying 12th Grand Slam title. And thanks to Andre Agassi and Steffi Graf, who staged career comebacks in Paris, there will be plenty of subplots:

• Can a rejuvenated Agassi become the first man since Bjorn Borg in 1980 to win the French Open and Wimbledon in the same year?

• Now that Graf has her first Grand Slam title since 1996, can she win Wimbledon for the eighth time?

• Or will youth be served? Will Venus Williams bounce back from disappointment in Paris to claim the family's first Grand Slam title?

• How will Martina Hingis perform following a French Open that ended in jeers and tears? Will she continue to serve underhand? Will British fans boo if she does?

• Can Boris Becker, in his last Wimbledon, draw inspiration from Agassi's showing in Paris?

• And finally, what in the world is John McEnroe doing out there with a racket?

To answer the last question first: The 40-year-old McEnroe, who often leads complaints that grass-court tennis has become boring, plans to interject his own excitement by playing mixed doubles with Graf.

That's a sideshow, and the Sampras story line will dominate Centre Court. He won Wimbledon in 1998 for the fifth time in six years but hasn't reached the last three Grand Slam finals, skipping the Australian Open entirely. He still needs one major title to match Roy Emerson's record of 12.

Sampras' slump this spring, capped by a second-round exit at Paris, prompted speculation that he's in decline at age 27. But Sampras also struggled early in 1998 before winning Wimbledon, and a return to grass rejuvenated his game again last week, when he beat Tim Henman in the final at Queen's.

"I'm trying to mentally put the first four or five months behind me," Sampras said. "It's been an up-and-down year, and I haven't played very many matches. I haven't felt like I've been in a great rhythm.

"I'm in the same boat I was last year at this time. Wimbledon turned my year around, and I hope that's the case this year."

Agassi's resurgence creates the tantalizing prospect of a showdown with Sampras in the final. Their rivalry was once the most touted in tennis, but they haven't met in a Grand Slam tournament since the 1995 U.S. Open final, which Sampras won.

Agassi's first major title came at Wimbledon in 1992, and two weeks ago he became only the fifth man to win all four Grand Slams. Now he'll try to become the first man to win the French Open and Wimbledon in the same year since Borg did it three times in a row, 1978-1980.

"That would be something," Agassi said. "I certainly know I have a lot more tennis in me."

Two days after winning the French, Agassi withdrew from a tournament in Halle, Germany, complaining of a sore thigh. But he practiced at Wimbledon several days this week and pronounced himself ready to challenge for the title.

"It can happen for me," Agassi said following a two-hour workout Saturday. "I wouldn't have believed what happened two weeks ago. Two weeks from now, who knows?"

Less convincing is the optimism expressed by Becker, who announced his retirement from Grand Slam competition in 1997, then decided this year to make one final appearance at Wimbledon. He has won the tournament three times but not since 1989.

"Two or three years ago I considered myself one of the few who had a chance at Wimbledon," Becker said. "I know I can play well on grass. I'm going to give a difficult match to anybody who is going to play me on it."

On the women's side, the sentimental favorite is Graf, who will try to build on her stunning performance in Paris. The Grand Slam title was Graf's 22nd, capping her comeback from a series of injuries that threatened her career.

"She surprised everybody and herself with the way she played," defending Wimbledon champion Jana Novotna said. "She played some of her best tennis in years. Her chances of playing well at Wimbledon and possibly winning it are great."

Novotna and Graf are among at least seven women capable of winning the title. The others: Lindsay Davenport, Monica Seles and those brash teen-agers – Hingis, Williams and Anna Kournikova. Williams' sister, Serena, withdrew because of the flu.

The top-ranked Hingis won Wimbledon in 1997. But she must regroup after unraveling in the French final, when she drew boos for complaining about calls and resorting to underhanded serves at the end of the match.

As for the other teen queens, they've fallen shy of expectations in major tournaments so far.

"I'm not sure if they're ready to do it over here at Wimbledon," Novotna said. "I think it will come down to experience – being in the semifinals and finals before and using everything you know to your advantage.

"But you never know. Anything can happen at Wimbledon."

In the next fortnight, there are sure to be some surprises. Perhaps even the sun will shine.

Wimbledon '99

The courts at Church Road were built in 1920, but Wimbledon is part of a tennis tradition that goes back to 1877. This year, Centre Court will be Pete Sampras' arena as he tries for a sixth win in seven years. No. 1-ranked Martina Hingis will have to put a disappointing French Open behind her if she is to bring home the title she won for the first time in 1997.

Zvereva hits back, takes title

EASTBOURNE, England (AP) – Natasha Zvereva lost the first nine games before scoring a 0-6, 7-5, 6-3 win over Nathalie Tauziat on Saturday to win the Eastbourne grasscourt championship.

It was the first title since 1994 for the sixth seed from Belarus.

Tennis

In the semifinals she had staged another comeback, saving three match points against Amanda Coetzer in the longest match on the WTA Tour this season while Tauziat came back from 5-1 down in the third to beat Anna Kournikova.

"I hadn't restored my energy from yesterday, and the conditions were extremely windy," Zvereva said. "And she was coping very well at the beginning and basically serving me off of the court.

"It wasn't pleasant being beaten 6-0, 3-0, but I thought I'd hit the ball as hard as I could and try and come in more. She gave me an opening, and I was just able to win more points."

Tauziat admitted the defeat was one of the most disappointing of her career after she had come close to regaining the title she won in 1995. It was also her second defeat in a final in seven days after she lost in Birmingham last Sunday.

McEnroe beats Borg, will face Connors in final

SAN DIEGO – John McEnroe beat Bjorn Borg 6-3, 6-4 Saturday to advance to the finals of the 1999 Quality Challenge senior tournament.

In Sunday's final, McEnroe will face Jimmy Connors, who beat Mats Wilander 7-6 (7-0), 6-2 on Friday.

McEnroe broke Borg on his first service game to take a 2-0 lead. Borg's chance to break back in the seventh game of the first set failed when McEnroe held on to serve out the set. In the second set, McEnroe took a 5-4 lead when Borg had consecutive double faults and he then served out the match.

When they played on the ATP Tour, McEnroe and Borg split 14 matches. On the senior circuit, McEnroe has won nine of 11.

NOTTINGHAM, England – Former Wimbledon and U.S. Open runnerup Cedric Pioline conquered a slow start Saturday to beat qualifier Kevin Ullyett of Zimbabwe to win the Nottingham Open.

But he broke back in the third and seventh games and went on to win 6-3, 7-5.

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) – The Italian city of Turin won the 2006 Winter Games on Saturday, beating favored Sion in an anti-Swiss backlash brought on by the Olympics' worst scandal.

Turin won 53-36 in a secret ballot by the International Olympic Committee, the first selection of a host city since the Salt Lake City bribery scandal.

The lopsided result reflected the deep resentment toward Marc Hodler, the Swiss IOC member who blew the whistle on Olympic corruption in December.

"This played a big role," Sion bid official Raymond Loretan said. "It was a main strategy used by our opponents."

The Swiss delegation said it would demand an explanation from the IOC.

"We had the best file and we had the best presentation," Loretan said.

The Italian delegation broke into cheers as the decision was announced.

"For us it was only a dream, now it's a reality," Turin Mayor Valentino Castellani told the assembly. "It's hard to be convinced to be completely awake."

Turin bid chief Evelina Cristillin beamed and made a thumbs-up sign to supporters in the hall as she took a seat at the top table to sign the host city contract.

The vote was announced about 7:30 a.m. in Turin, where the streets were deserted on a rainy Saturday morning.

Four other candidates in the all-European race were eliminated earlier when a special panel reduced the field: Helsinki, Finland; Klagenfurt, Austria; Poprad-Tatry, Slovakia; and Zakopane, Poland.

The 2006 race was dominated by the fallout from the vote-buying scandal which broke six months ago surrounding Salt Lake's winning bid for the 2002 Games.

The scandal plunged the IOC into the biggest crisis of its 105-year history, leading to the ouster of 10 members and prompting changes in the bid and selection process for 2006.

The race came down to a contest between two sharply different candidates – Sion, a provincial capital of 26,000 in the heart of the Swiss Alps, and Turin, the northern Italian industrial city of 2.2 million.

Turin, making its first bid, will bring the Winter Olympics to Italy for the first time since the 1956 Games in Cortina D'Ampezzo.

The result marked the third defeat for Sion, which failed in previous bids for the 1976 and 2002 Winter Games. The last time Switzerland staged the games was in 1948 in St. Moritz.

Uptown Downtown Artown

Mid-summer in Reno offers much more than gambling

RENO, Nev. (AP) – From the artwork of Miles Davis, John Lennon and Jerry Garcia, to dance troupes, a Cuban jazz band and anonymous authors who will "write for food," a town better known for slot machines and craps is gearing up for a monthlong arts festival.

A variety of cities around the world boast the largest opera festivals, blues festivals, ballet festivals, film festivals, theater festivals, folk festivals, etc.

But on the banks of the Truckee River, in the shadow of the Sierra Nevada, Reno's fourth annual Uptown Downtown Artown festival is trying to stake a claim as the one that offers a taste of it all – each and every day for the month of July.

Where else can you find on the same program the Diablo Ballet of San Francisco, the North American Basque Convention, Chautauqua-style storytelling and the work of Beso Kazaishvili, a 13-year-old Soviet boy who survived Soviet Georgia's bloody civil war to become a child prodigy painter for peace?

Not to mention blues singer Zakiya Hooker, daughter of guitar great John Lee Hooker, and the first major American exhibition since 1921 of the work of Czech designer Alphonse Mucha, one of the top decorative artists of turn-of-the-century Paris.

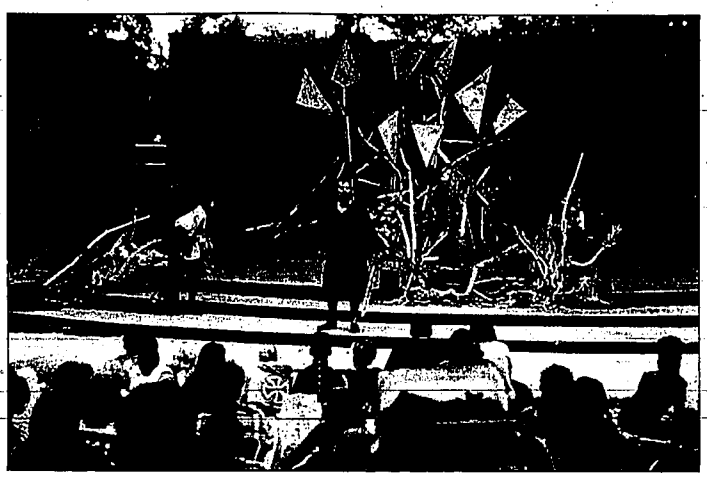
"You can find free art virtually every morning, afternoon and evening every day of July."

Uptown Downtown Artown started four years ago as an attempt to fill a tourism gap between the Reno Rodeo in June and the Hot August Nights car rally.

But it's turning into a promising part of civic leaders' efforts to revive the Biggest Little City In the World and restore its sense of community.



AP photo

Performers present Shakespeare in the Park during last summer's month-long arts festival in Reno Nev.

"One of the things we are trying to do downtown is create an attractive safe place for Reno families," Reno Mayor Jeff Griffin said.

"If we do that, they will have a reason to come back downtown and that will spill over into our tourism base."

Karen Craig, the festival's executive director, said there was a lot of skepticism when area arts and business leaders first hatched the idea for the event.

"It used to be that people would say no one would come to Reno for the arts," Craig said.

A few local casino operators and other corporate executives reluctantly agreed to be sponsors "more as a community service," she said.

"But now they are talking about its marketing potential. Now the casinos say it is an image they want. It paints a picture of quality and sophistication that Reno would love to have out there," she said.

The festival roams around town, from the downtown casino district that flourished in the 1940s and 1950s, to the University of Nevada campus and old neighborhoods dating to the turn of the century.

It's based along the Truckee River, a cold, mountain river that races from Lake Tahoe 30 miles away, down the eastern front of the Sierra Nevada and through the middle of town.

Craig arrived from Colorado, where she gained experience in arts in a tourist-based economy at the Telluride Institute.

The "boom and bust" economy of the Colorado ski town taught her about the need for arts to help serve as a backbone to a community, Craig said.

In most resort areas, there is little sense of community, she said. And she recognized the same thing when she arrived in Reno.

"From what you read, locals don't go downtown. They don't want to live downtown. They certainly don't take their kids downtown," Craig said.

"In general, locals don't speak highly about the place where they live. It's like it's not their home town. Reno is somebody else's vacation."

And yet, Reno is bustling with the arts, she said. A good share of the local community doesn't know that Reno boasts its own art museum, opera company, ballet, symphony and chamber orchestra.

Rock stars descend on Germany to press leaders on rights issues

Knight Ridder News Service

If the Summit of Eight can't generate enough excitement in Cologne, Germany, a small collection of rock legends certainly can.

As the leaders of seven leading industrialized nations and Russia met Friday, the Rolling Stones arrived to conclude their "Bridges to Babylon" tour. And U2 frontman Bono planned to wrap a human chain around downtown Cologne.

Bono was to arrive Saturday with a petition to G-8 leaders urging debt forgiveness for poor countries, although they beat him to the punch Friday. There's also no word on whether the human chain, in support of debt relief, will actually happen after the fact. Organizers had expected 70,000 people.

The Stones took over an entire hotel and began preparing to perform Friday night just across the border in Landgraf, Netherlands. The final show of their 18-month tour is in Cologne on Sunday.

It wasn't certain Friday whether any of the G-8 leaders would attend Sunday's concert. Aides said German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder – a Stones fan who has seen them perform live once – has a full schedule.

Stephanopoulos move at ABC draws criticism

George Stephanopoulos is the new anchor of ABC's World News Now, which airs after midnight, but media critic Marvin Kalb told the Washington Post that it's a terrible idea.

"You're not a journalist simply because you're a star," he said. "I find all of this profoundly upsetting, but certainly consistent with the trend in television news."

Today's the day for the big wedding in Britain

Prince Edward's two brothers will be at his side today when he weds Sophie Rhys-Jones in London.

Princes Charles and Andrew will act as Edward's "supporters," the royal equivalent of best men. Edward, the youngest son of Queen Elizabeth II, acted as a supporter at the weddings of both of his elder brothers.

The couple has also asked four children to act as bridesmaids and page boys.

The bridesmaids will be 8-year-old Camilla Hadden, Edward's godchild, and 5-year-old Olivia Taylor, whose parents are longtime friends of Rhys-Jones. The page boys will be 6-year-old Harry Warburton, a son of one of Edward's aides, and 7-year-old Felix Sowerbutts, the son of other friends of Rhys-Jones.

Leno's 'joke' auction raises funds at event

The "Tonight Show" host was presiding over a Petersen Automotive Museum auction Thursday in Los Angeles when bidding opened for the privilege of dinner with museum director Ken Gross.

"How much will you pay not to have dinner with Ken Gross?" Leno asked the crowd of 1,300.

The audience immediately surged to the podium with $20 bills, which were collected by Gross himself.

In under three minutes, more than $500 was raised.

Officers scour the countryside for suspected serial murderer

The Dallas Morning News

LA GRANGE, Texas – For more than two decades, Rafael Resendez-Ramirez rode the rails across the nation, pretty much going nowhere. He alternated arrests and prison terms with numerous deportations to his native Mexico.

Somewhere along the line, police say, the tattooed drifter with the piercing eyes may have become a hunter, leaving a trail of murder victims along the train tracks.

Resendez-Ramirez is now the prey. About 200 law enforcement personnel – FBI agents, Texas Rangers, Houston police and local police – have formed a task force to conduct a national manhunt for him in connection with at least six brutal murders in Texas and Kentucky.

As investigators track his movements through rail yards and homeless shelters from California to Kentucky, they say what initially seemed isolated bursts of violence are beginning to coalesce into the pattern of a serial murderer. And law enforcement officers, geared for reports of old killings that match the pattern, fear the death toll may grow higher.

"Right now, he's probably the most sought man in Texas," said Texas Department of Public Safety spokesman Mike Cox. "Texas Rangers working on the investigation are very concerned that whoever is doing these killings will kill again. That's why they want to find this guy so badly."

Resendez-Ramirez, approximately 38, has proved a slippery target. Since 1976, when he was first deported after crossing the border illegally into Brownsville, Texas, Resendez-Ramirez's lengthy arrest record is dotted with more than 20 aliases and five birth dates. He has claimed his birthplace is Puebla, Mexico, Vera Cruz, and Ciudad Juarez.

"We've had a lot of difficulty at substantiating the real identity of the suspect because of the numerous instances of false and misleading information in immigration documents and arrest records," said FBI agent Rolando Moss in Houston.

Like images in a hall or mirrors, it is difficult to determine which is the real Resendez-Ramirez and which is the illusion. The deception is complicated, investigators said, because Resendez-Ramirez mixes truth and fiction with the stories he's told.

On Oct. 20, 1992, Resendez-Ramirez began a 20-year sentence at the New Mexico Department of Corrections at Grants, N.M., under the name of Antonio Martinez. According to the psychological evaluation given in prison, he was found to be a social drinker but not a drug user and showed no indications of mental illness. He also claimed to have never married but to have four children by different mothers.

"Claims to be an orphan, whose parents, Antonio and Anna Martinez were poor and sold flowers in eastern Mexico," the report read. "He claimed after his parents died, he moved in with a relative, Francisco Resendez-Ramirez, at age 11 and was on his own at age 13."

In prison, he had a spotless disciplinary record. He was placed in administrative segregation for several months, at his own request, prison officials said, because he "feared other inmates."

His first arrest had been, as he told prison officials, by the U.S. Border Patrol in Brownsville when, at about age 15, he crossed the border in a freight car. How much else is true about his past is being checked by investigators, the FBI said.

"It was a pretty common type of burglary," said Det. Jaime Montoya of the Las Cruces Police Department. "Early in the morning of May 3, 1992, a homeowner heard a noise in the house and scared this guy away. He was caught a short while later.

"He appeared to be a transient, so we took his information and filed charges against him," Det. Montoya said. "Now, it looks like the people in that house were just lucky people."

That's small comfort for the residents living in the corridor between Houston and San Antonio. They believe Resendez-Ramirez is the key to a string of railroad track murders that have disrupted the peace and security of small-town life.

Three of the murders took place only miles apart amid the rolling pastures and farmland of Fayette and Colorado counties. In both counties, officials said, gun stores have sold out of weapons and hardware stores have been picked clean of locks, burglar alarms and security lights.

"This is a community of hard-working, God-fearing people," said Fayette County Sheriff Rick Vandel. "People are used to leaving their doors unlocked and leaving the keys in the truck. This is the crime that changed all that."

Down the road in Weimar, a Colorado County farming community of about 2,100, the fear is as tangible as the water tower that rises at the center of town. "It's like one of those slasher movies, where the killer is all but invisible," said Bruce Beal, editor and publisher of the Weimar Mercury. "The biggest fear is that he'll come back, that there's something here that attracted him to kill three people in the area."

Resendez-Ramirez was first linked to the Dec. 17, 1998, slaying of Dr. Claudia Benton at her home in West University Place in Houston. The 39-year-old physician was stabbed three times in the back, beaten to death and sexually assaulted. Resendez-Ramirez's fingerprints were found inside her home, which is about 100 yards from the railroad tracks.

Investigators linked DNA evidence gathered at the Benton crime scene to evidence gathered in Weimar in Colorado County, where the Rev. Norman "Skip" Sirnic, 46, and his wife, Karen, 47, were brutally murdered four months later in the parsonage behind Weimar United Church of Christ.

The couple were found by parishioners May 2 after they failed to show up for Sunday services. They had been beaten to death with a sledgehammer. Karen Sirnic was sexually assaulted. The railroad tracks run only yards behind the garden where Karen Sirnic grew sunflowers and vegetables. The Sirnics' 1998 red Mazda pickup, as well as Benton's Jeep Cherokee were later found abandoned in San Antonio.

On June 4, in Fayette County, just three miles south of the Sirnic home, 73-year-old Josephine Konvicka was found bludgeoned as she slept in the tiny farmhouse where she had lived all her life. The house sits nearly a mile from the railroad tracks, separated by dense overgrowth.

JP Realty shareholders will get cash dividend

SALT LAKE CITY – JP Realty Inc. declared a 46.5-cent per-share cash dividend for the period from March 31 through June 30.

The dividend is to be paid July 20 to shareholders of record as of July 8, said JP Realty, an owner and operator of retail shopping center properties in the nation's intermountain region.

JP Realty (NYSE: JPR) owns one property in Twin Falls – the 37,000-square-foot Twin Falls Crossing on Blue Lakes Boulevard, a former Ernst store facility, President Rex Frazier said. JP Realty's predecessor company, Price Development Co., built the Magic Valley Mall.

The company said it owns or has interest in 50 properties containing an aggregate of more than 14.35 million square feet of gross leasable area in 10 Western states.

Windermere ranks fourth in nation among rivals

In the publication's ranking of 300 firms, "1999 Power Broker Report," Windermere was the only Northwest firm included in the top 10, claiming the fourth spot in both transactions (34,941) and sales volume ($8.5 million) in 1998, a Windermere news release said.

Windermere has 180 offices – including ones in Hailey and Twin Falls – and more than 4,800 agents serving Washington, Oregon and Idaho.

Sorry, dads: Americans spend more on mothers

Americans may love their dads just as much as they love their moms, but they don't spend as much celebrating Father's Day, according to the National Retail Federation.

The average person spends $90 to celebrate Father's Day but $105 to fete to mom, the world's largest retail association said.

The retail association gathered sales figures from a variety of industry sources, including the Neckwear Association of America and the Greeting Card Association.

Dads lose in the greeting card department, too. The retail organization reports that children buy 95 million Father's Day cards, compared with 150 million Mother's Day cards.

"Customers buy more cards and gifts for moms," concurred Douglas D'Urso, manager at Mongrel, a Carytown card shop.

Scott Krugman, a spokesman at the retail federation, said Father's Day is at the lower end of the shopping cycle. Back-to-school, Christmas, Halloween and Mother's Day rake in more sales.

But just before Father's Day, Home Depot sees more business than usual, and more than just before Mother's Day, according to George Lucas, store manager for the Home Depot on West Broad Street.

"We don't see sales as far drawn out as Christmas, but as holidays go, it's one of our best," he said.

Ties are still the No. 1 gift for dads. Other common gifts include sportswear, athletic equipment, books and music. Cigars are hot this year, too.

Scott Reppert, the General Manager of AmeriPride Linen and Apparel Services in Twin Falls, shows off a bags filter that is the heart of a new clean room the company is building to launder garments for the computer industry.

By Virginia S. Hutchins
Times-News writer

TWIN FALLS – It didn't do a market study first, and it doesn't have any customers signed on.

But starting this week, a Twin Falls laundry hopes to capture business that Idaho manufacturers have sent out of state.

In an unused part of its building, AmeriPride Linen and Apparel Services is building a stringently particle-free laundry room to clean special suits worn by computer-chip manufacturers – and AmeriPride is depending on the room's in-state accessibility, swift turnaround and unique service to make customers come.

"We've kind of done the 'Field of Dreams' gig," said Scott Reppert, AmeriPride general manager.

Boise computer manufacturer Micron Technology Inc. anticipates doing some clean-room laundry business with AmeriPride – if the new facility comes out clean in Micron's qualification process, said Noe DeValle, Micron's production support manager.

"We are currently looking at their facility to see what they can provide for our company," DeValle said.

It usually takes Micron at least 90 days to check out a prospective vendor's quality controls, customer service, on-time delivery, cost competitiveness and product cleanliness on its return to Boise, he said. Micron sends the product – in this case, cleaned garments – to laboratories for evaluation, and all the data goes to a committee for a decision.

"Clean-room laundering is extremely important to the process of making chips," DeValle said. Particles that must be eliminated can't be seen by the human eye.

The manufacturer does have its own clean-room laundry in-house, he said, but it can't keep up with the wash piles. So Micron sends some of the business off-site. Though it uses an AmeriPride competitor in Nampa, Micron isn't any longer sending laundry out of state because of a downturn in the semiconductor business.

"Right now the demand is not there," DeValle said. But when the downturn ends, there will be more opportunities for companies to do business with Micron.

Besides Micron's own facility, AmeriPride's clean-room laundry is the only one in Idaho capable of meeting "Class 10" particle-free requirements, Reppert said.

The new room depends on specially engineered features to eliminate dust and lint, such as de-ionized water in the washer and special air filters in the vents, he said. Air in the dryer is sucked out through the spinning basket and refiltered. Only 10 percent of the air in the room is from the outside; 90 percent is recirculated.

The facility has "positive" air flow, meaning that air pressure is greater inside than outside. Whenever an entrance is opened, air flows out.

A machine counts air-borne particles in each part of the washing, drying, folding and packaging process and tests a garment from each load. If it doesn't meet stringent specifications, the load goes back through.

For shipping, the cleaned garments are wrapped in two layers of nonstatic plastic.

"There's no lint that comes through any of this," Reppert said.

The room's walls are coated in acrylic car paint that can be rubbed down with alcohol and distilled water, said AmeriPride's chief engineer, Darrel Hamlett, who with Reppert went to school to learn to design and build a clean room.

The garments the system cleans are no casual clothes. They have carbon-steel filaments woven into polypropylene to dissipate static charge, he said.

To operate its new venture, AmeriPride will need four workers inside and one or two outside the new facility, Reppert said. Three of those jobs will be filled by new hires now, and a fourth will be hired in December, he predicted.

AmeriPride needed to diversify to keep going strong, he said.

And it's not the first time the Twin Falls business has done something out of the ordinary. Reppert shows with pride the system that transfers heat from scalding, dirty water to clean well water.

"All that energy efficiency is the stuff you really have to do to make money," he said.

Market yourself

Knight Ridder News Service

And there's no better way to do just that than by going in well prepared.

"Selling yourself is a learned skill," said Bea Ludwig, human resources coordinator for Kaiser Permanente. "The more you practice it, the better you get at it."

Your personal sales pitch

Here are ideas for preparing and presenting your personal sales pitch, according to area experts:

- Get samples of your work product in front of the interviewer. Ahead of time, pack them up to go in with you. And think about how to pull them out at the first lull in the conversation.

"Samples can prove something about your writing skills or thought processes," said Jay Meschke, senior vice president for EFL Associates//Transearch, an executive search firm. "If there's confidential information in your samples, just black that out."

- Distinguish yourself by giving your future employer something others won't.

"It's appropriate to ask, 'Is there something I can do to distinguish my candidacy from others you've interviewed?'" Meschke said.

If the employer doesn't know what you can do, volunteer an idea. "What if I wrote a paper about how the Internet might affect your business?" Meschke suggested.

- Be prepared to tell why you really want to work there.

"Why is that company your first choice?" said Lisa Farr, human resources manager//risk manager for the seven Kansas City area facilities of Prime Health Medical Group, a subsidiary of Family Practice Associates. "Saying you saw their ad and need a job is honest, but it doesn't show much enthusiasm."

- Be ready for testing.

If it's a clerical position, you probably can count on getting one that will check your skills in areas such as number recognition, matching and alphabetizing.

There are also PC tests to see if you can use different computer programs and sometimes psychological testing at a higher level, Farr said. If your future job is in banking or some area of finance, security and bonding checks might be ordered.

At Kaiser Permanente, pharmacists go through testing in which they answer specific questions about prescriptions, Ludwig said. About 75 percent of applicants at Kaiser Permanente go through pre-interview computer screening. If you're leery of testing, make sure you ask questions about how that testing might occur.

- Practice, practice, practice those interview questions.

Consumers win one on brain-damaged DIVX

By Dan Gillmor
San Jose Mercury News

Online

Every now and then, consumers win one. This week, we won a biggie when the corporate parents of DIVX, the deliberately brain-damaged cousin of DVD, finally pulled the plug on an awesomely awful technology.

DVD, the digital video disk the size of an audio CD or PC CD-ROM, has revolutionized home video. It boasts fine images and sound quality plus wide-screen viewing, subtitles and more.

DIVX matched only several of DVD's viewing benefits but included a huge demerit: a scheme in which consumers would buy a disk and then pay about $4.50 for the right to view it for 48 hours. Once a month, the DIVX player would call a potentially big-brotherish central computer to report on the titles you had watched.

The party line from Circuit City, the retailing chain that pushed this bizarre scheme, was convenience. You'd just pick up the disk and view it at your leisure. You wouldn't have to return it to the store as with a typical video rental. You'd avoid the late fees, the company proclaimed without irony, failing to note that at a price of $4.50 for 48 hours (and more if you wanted to watch it again later on) you were in effect already paying the late fee. Oh, yes, the DIVX players were more expensive than DVD-only players.

Consumers logically viewed this lawyer-hatched scheme as anything but beneficial to their interests. They saw a bad product that was pushing them down a slippery slope toward the day when they'll have to pay each time they want to read, listen to or view anything digital – and they said, "No, thanks" in droves.

DIVX was a dictatorial, we-know-what's-best-for-you business model. The campaign against DIVX had a grass-roots flavor from the start even though it was supported by corporate interests suspicious of the motives of Circuit City and other backers of the technology.

As has become the case in any serious grass-roots campaign, the Internet played an essential role. DIVX opponents posted and shared information that journalists and consumers found useful in understanding why this technology was such a bad idea.

DIVX backers had their own Internet presence, complete with rebuttals to the opponents' claims. I'll bet that almost every potential DIVX customer who took the time to study the two sides' claims online – as opposed to listening only to the salesperson's in-store pitch – bought a DVD player or nothing at all.

"In a column last year I suggested that consumers stay away from DIVX. I hope I had some small impact. In the end, however, consumers should congratulate themselves. They looked at the choices – and then made the correct one.

With friends like these: Part XXXIV in ongoing saga

Consumers have almost no true choice when they buy a personal computer, something the federal government and 19 state governments have been explaining to a federal judge for months at the Microsoft Corp. antitrust trial in Washington, D.C., Microsoft hasn't found many plausible defense witnesses, as we saw again this week as yet

SUN VALLEY – When the Idaho Trial Lawyers Association met June 11 in Sun Valley to hold its annual business meeting and present continuing legal education, a special tribute was paid to Lloyd J. Webb of Twin Falls.

Webb is a founding member of the ITLA and has represented the citizens of Idaho since beginning his legal career in 1956. ITLA is a statewide voluntary bar association dedicated to representation of Idaho's consumers, a news release said.

Idaho business group, officials consider effects of e-commerce

MCCALL (AP) – Idaho's industry and government leaders worry that the state's growing e-commerce trade could impact Idaho's tax revenue and cause unfair competition for businesses.

Utah Gov. Michael Leavitt told about 100 industry and state government leaders that sales over the Internet are taxed haphazardly or not at all.

"This system will not work in the 21st century," Leavitt said Friday. "It's fundamentally unfair."

Leavitt, Idaho Gov. Dirk Kempthorne and U.S. Chamber of Commerce President Tom Donohue addressed the annual convention of the Idaho Association of Commerce and Industry, the state's most influential business organization.

This year's 25th anniversary meeting focused on business in transition. The threat posed by e-commerce was a common thread running throughout Friday's presentation.

"I'm very concerned about how traditional business will cope," Donohue said. "You can't set up a system that bypasses state tax systems."

"It's going to have an impact on the revenue stream in this state," Idaho House Republican Floor Leader Frank Bruneel of Lewiston said.

Leavitt cited as an example a recent purchase he made over the Internet. While traveling in California, he ordered groceries from a New York company to be delivered to his Utah home.

"How do you determine who ought to get that (tax) money?" he asked. "We have to sort this out."

Some of those on hand said they could not imagine Internet shopping becoming a huge force because people like to try on and handle merchandise. But Amy Kleiner, governmental affairs manager for Micron Technology Inc., said there may be an generational difference between traditional and Internet shoppers.

As a busy working mother, Kleiner said she often finds herself ordering merchandise off the Internet at 1 a.m.

Superwoman may be wearing out

Chicago Tribune

Remember the myth of Superwoman, a descriptive title that became widespread in the early 1970s for a woman who did it all?

Remember that Jane of all trades, able to leap tall kitchens while changing diapers and holding down an exhausting job?

Well, she finally may be disappearing.

Hollis Chalem-Brown, department chair of office systems technology at Oakton Community College in Des Plaines, Ill., admits she was a model Superwoman almost three decades ago. "I tried to be the perfect wife, mother, teacher, homemaker and lover," said Chalem-Brown, 52.

She was married to the late Robert Chalem and when her husband was alive, Chalem-Brown did what Superwomen do: Already the possessor of a bachelor's degree in business, she juggled two teaching jobs, went to college at night, earned her master's degree in business in 1973, ran the household and spent "quality time" with her sons.

"My husband helped me with everything but it wasn't a 50-50 sharing – and I didn't expect it," said Chalem-Brown. Eventually, she also had to take care of her husband, who was ill. He died in 1976, when Chalem-Brown was 29 and her sons were 5 and 6. Still acting as Superwoman, Chalem-Brown intensified her efforts to provide for her family and earned her doctorate in vocational and technical education in 1979 – while teaching and running the household.

"My children were latchkey kids before the term was invented, but I felt I was developing a good life for them," she said. In 1991, she married Bruce Brown, owner of Gourmet Express Inc., in Northbrook, Ill., "a company that delivers meals so Superwoman doesn't have to cook anymore," Chalem-Brown observed.

No longer a Superwoman, she said, "Superwoman is fading away, taking off her cape. She says out loud that she needs balance in her life and even tells her employer and her mate."

There are other reasons Superwoman's on her way out: "Women and men, especially men with young children, have formed a new coalition to create public- and private-sector policies that enable them to attend to both their work and families," said Anne Ladky, executive director of Women Employed, a national organization based in Chicago dedicated to women's economic advancement.

"Today's young women believe equality is possible, though it's not here yet," said Jean E. Rhodes, associate professor of psychology and women's studies at the University of Illinois at Champaign/Urbana. "Men are taking up some of the household burden and that's why Superwoman's disappearing."

Rhodes, 37, is married to Dane Wittrup, professor of chemical engineering at the university. They have three children under the age of 7. "I've never tried to be a Superwoman," said the professor, who has a doctorate in clinical psychology. "The way we solve the Superwoman problem is by having child care and household help. The time not spent cleaning up gives us time with our kids."

Superwoman was a "construct of guilt and ambivalence and women were played upon by people not sympathetic to them," said Suzanne Braun Levine, a New York media critic and author of the forthcoming book, "The Daddy Track: How men are reinventing fatherhood."

Many women "pretended they could do everything, so society wouldn't punish them for having a job," said Levine, 57, formerly editor of Ms. magazine and the Columbia Journalism Review. She's married to Robert Levine, an entertainment lawyer. Their son Joshua is 15 and daughter Joanna, 13.

"More and more men and women understand you can't have it all," said Levine, who says she stopped trying to be Superwoman "when I was in my late 40s and developed a 'don't mess with me' attitude."

Her daughter, she's certain, won't even consider being Superwoman. "Joanna knows there's a different way to live," her mother said. "It's called freedom."

Give very best for less than a buck

NEW YORK (AP) – This Father's Day, if you care enough to send the very best, you can do it for under a buck.

Hallmark has begun selling a line of 99-cent cards with simpler designs and basic messages. The nation's top greeting card maker hopes the strategy will eliminate its pricey image and boost sales.

"I love it," said Eleana Conde, 36, while buying eight Father's Day cards on Friday at a Hallmark store in New York.

Buying regular-priced greeting cards for fathers, stepfathers, godfathers and grandfathers can get quite expensive, and that's not even counting the gifts, she said. "These cards really help me."

Hallmark cards sell for an average of about $2, though it's not hard to find some for $2.95 or $3.95.

Other greeting card companies have sold $1 cards for years, but Hallmark's move stands out because it's the industry biggest player and because of the emphasis the company is placing on the new cards.

Already, the privately held Kansas City, Mo.-based company has sold about 63 million of the 99-cent Warm Wishes cards since it began a national rollout in March. Still, the Warm Wishes sales will make up only a small portion of the 3.5 billion cards Hallmark expects to sell this year.

This Father's Day, if you care enough to give the very best, you can do it for under a buck. Hallmark has begun selling a line of 99-cent cards with simpler designs and basic messages.

Shoppers say the 99-cent cards have the Hallmark quality. With their bright, glossy colors, quality paper and fun and corny language, the cards don't look like a cheap version of their standard assortment.

By selling the cards for less than $1, Hallmark officials say they hope people will be motivated to buy cards for more casual relationships such as neighbors, co-workers and acquaintances – in other words, people for whom you might balk at buying a $3 card just to say "Hello."

The lower price might also deter some people from sending free – but impersonal – electronic greeting cards over the Internet.

It's dad's turn to be commercialized

Knight Ridder News Service

Shoppers who think they have noticed more television commercials hawking dad-targeted products or bigger store displays touting the perfect gift for Father's Day may be right.

Retailers have marketed everything from Christmas to Thanksgiving and nearly every holiday in between, selling baubles and cards for every occasion. Now they're relying on the mom-dad-grad season to boost traditionally slow pre-summer sales.

"There's no question that not only the marketing of Father's Day and Mother's Day have increased, but Halloween, Valentine's Day, Martin Luther King Day, Memorial Day" have as well, said Michael Mazis, a professor of marketing at American University.

"Marketers have realized that there's commercial benefit in tying their products to holidays," he said.

Father's Day is getting more attention in 1999 than in years past, said Pradeep Rau, chairman of the marketing department at George Washington University.

"I certainly see Father's Day gaining market clout. It just used to live in the shadow of Mother's Day. In good economic times, certainly retailers are focusing on the area," he said.

Rick Britton, president of Arnold Communications in McLean, said Father's Day presents a unique opportunity among holidays.

"There are few chances to develop a target to the male audience. Most other holidays target families or women."

But Father's Day still doesn't have the same level of marketing as Mother's Day because "advertisers are more anxious to reach women," he said.

But retailers are beginning to package Mother's Day and Father's Day together, with other traditional spring events like graduation, weddings and births, as part of a May-June package.

Ethical issues arise when investigator becomes target of suit

Knight Ridder News Service

If an employee believes he has been discriminated against at work, he typically lodges a complaint with the human resource department or affirmative action office.

But what does the employee do when the top officer in charge of investigating complaints is accused of the very same wrongdoing and remains in office?

Whom does he turn to? More importantly, what can the institution do to maintain its integrity in handling future discrimination complaints?

The issue popped up recently in a high-profile case involving sex discrimination allegations at the University of Houston.

Equal Employment Opportunity Commission staff members recently determined that Dennis Duffy, the general counsel of the University of Houston, created a hostile working environment for women and retaliated against an employee who complained.

Working

The case is pending, awaiting settlement discussions. The EEOC will seek concessions such as back wages, damages and reinstatement and will turn the case over to the Justice Department if it can't reach a settlement.

No suit against the university or Duffy has been filed.

Though the situation at the university is unusual, it's even more unusual, say lawyers who specialize in job discrimination cases, when the top officer continues handling his or her discrimination duties as Duffy has.

Duffy didn't return telephone calls for comment. However, Chancellor Arthur K. Smith said that Duffy is doing an outstanding job and that he and the board of regents are fully behind Duffy.

Kerry Notestine, a lawyer who represents employers, said anytime someone is investigated for a serious wrongdoing, it's a good idea to shift job responsibilities.

That way, employees can feel comfortable coming forward to complain, Notestine said. Most employers would want to try to keep a clear path open for making complaints.

Reassigning the responsibilities shows the employees the system works for them, and it also helps the company's legal position, because it shows the regulators that the employer is doing something about the problem.

Dawn Bennett-Alexander, professor of employment law at the Terry College of Business at the University of Georgia in Athens and an expert on discrimination, agreed.

"You've got to give some integrity to the process," she says. If a company doesn't, she added, "People won't think it's on the up and up."

An employee won't complain if he doesn't feel confident about the process, she said. And if that happens, employees won't want to stay and the problems fester.

Also, by not farming out the duties of the person who handles sex discrimination complaints, a company can risk losing an important defense, Notestine said. Last summer, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled companies can protect themselves if they have a meaningful system to handle complaints.

asked by checking out books with interviewing tips. What you don't say is just as important as what you do say. Practicing with a friend by using flash cards will make the answers come faster and easier, Ludwig said.

The most common interview question probably is the icebreaker: Tell me something about yourself.

Don't get trapped, the experts said. This one can give your future employer reasons not to choose you if you say too many personal things about your dozen children and a sick grandmother. Think of it as an opportunity, instead, to showcase your job skills.

Behavioral questions also are big today. Those questions are "anything that makes you use life experiences to answer," according to Farr. Popular is "Tell me how you handled a confrontation with a co-worker," Farr said.

According to Farr, a good answer is: I asked the co-worker to go for coffee or lunch and talk things out. A bad answer is: I told the boss and asked him or her to handle it.

It's probably inevitable that Microsoft witnesses are better for the government than the defense, given the factual record and through-the-looking-glass quality of the company's arguments. Like a corporate Humpty Dumpty, scornfully saying that any word means just what he says it means, Microsoft keeps trying to convince the world that the Windows operating system isn't a monopoly in the antitrust context.

Eubanks has been a vocal public defender of Microsoft for years, and believes that technology moves too fast for any company to control markets for long. Yet even he can't avoid the obvious. He admits Microsoft has a monopoly, though he says some monopolies are "natural" – especially when technology is involved.

I've always thought that the most important outcome of this case will be a judicial finding that Microsoft does indeed possess a monopoly. Such a finding would force the company to behave better or face a nonstop barrage of civil antitrust cases (and it's already in court with several apart from the governments' suit).

Eubanks and some other Microsoft defenders frame the debate in a way that at least has some intellectual juice. They acknowledge the Windows monopoly, noting the real benefits of standards, but say new technologies inevitably undermine the dominance; consumers therefore have little to worry about in the long run even as they're well-served in the short term.

It's an interesting argument, but it assumes that a) Microsoft runs a benevolent dictatorship and b) Microsoft – or any company in a similar position – is incapable of using its current power to prevent new technologies from eroding its position. The former is clearly false, as the record shows.

If we want to test the the latter, just stop enforcing the antitrust laws. Do we really want to take that risk?

The Way To A Woman's Heart

If there is any room that has the ability to sell a house on its own, it is the kitchen. In recent years, the trend has been to open up the floor plan to make the kitchen the hub of family activities. The prospective woman of the house stands in the best position to appreciate the overall appeal, good design and efficiency of the kitchen in homes she is considering purchase. Sellers, therefore, should make every effort to make their kitchens as attractive as possible. If necessary, worn and/or dark-colored cabinet doors and shelves should be refaced. Floors and countertops should also be replaced if need be. The effort is sure to be appreciated (and worthwhile).

If you are thinking of selling your home, call me, DONNA BACH, at COLDWELL BANKER WESTERN REALTY, and I will prepare a comparative market analysis on your present property. Cows in the milking barn at SI-Ellen Dairy in Jerome show off the techno neckwear that keeps tabs on their production and makes the dairy managers more efficient. Automated Systems track dairy efficiency.

The Times-News

Competent and carefully controlled production is essential for modern dairies to be profitable and produce high quality milk. For progressive Magic Valley dairymen, efficiency and better management techniques are only two of the advantages of using automated dairy systems. The computer controlled milk production systems give operators control over their herds at the push of a button, or even the click of the mouse.

"We've been using ours for about five years now, and it's an awesome system," Judy Mezes, operator and family co-owner of Si-Ellen Dairy said enthusiastically. "We use our system daily."

Si-Ellen is a 2,800-cow dairy with a parallel parlor milking barn outside of Jerome.

Todd Roth, also a co-owner in Si-Ellen and manager/owner of Idaho Dairy Supply in Kimberly agrees with his sister's brief evaluation. But Roth says the key advantage of the automatic milking and monitoring system is having the information for each cow on hand at all times. The Dairy Herd Improvement Association approved system is also more accurate by giving a seven-day average on each cow's production.

"A seven-day average is much more accurate," Roth said. "DHIA testers come out once a month and take two milk weights. But the automatic system is much more accurate than that, with the seven-day average."

The milking system, giving control of herds up to 2,800 cows, begins with a scanner collar worn by the cow, called a transponder. Each cow's transponder is coded exactly to a small computer-read management panel, called a milking point controller (MPC) in the parlor stalls. When the cow enters the parlor, the tag is automatically read and each cow identified individually.

Rupert's Whitesides Dairy herd manager Kevin Christiansen points out that some systems include a portal antenna for separate stalls, while others have entry and exit portals at each end of the parlor.

"Our dairy cows have individual ID tags," Christiansen said, explaining the cow collars. "Then we have an antenna in each stall to identify that specific cow and her milking information."

Once the cow is on the milker machine, the computer-driven system measures significant information for dairy management. Although the systems vary in some ways, commonly collected information includes milk yields, how much time each cow is on the milker, what time of day the cow was milked and any deviations from her normal milking.

"We can pull up a low yield list off the processor," explained Roth. "And we could look at 70 percent of her seven-day average. For instance, if she usually milked 100 pounds and only is milking 69 pounds for that day, she'll show up on the list that's put out by the processor, and we can take a look at why her production is down."

Chapter 12: Option, not failure for many farmers

Idaho's Chapter 12 Bankruptcy Trustee Forest Hymas is a shrewd businessman, by training and by instinct. That's probably why he is so good at his job – helping farmers reorganize their debt and save their farms.

His business background also makes him adamant in the belief that filing Chapter 12 is a positive action and nothing remotely reflective of failure.

"I've had people sit in that chair and cry for two hours," Hymas said. They say, "'Grandad farmed, Dad farmed, I failed,' but they have not failed. They're desperate, frustrated, confused, everything's gone wrong. But the point of it is, they have not failed. This is a second chance to save the estate."

Hymas said there's a lot of misunderstanding concerning the different bankruptcy chapters. Chapter 12 is not a bailout, not a liquidation; it's a way to stay in business while working on a repayment plan.

"There's always options, and people get a little desperate, they forget there are options," Hymas said. "Bankruptcy is an option."

And it's strictly guided by bankruptcy laws, some resulting from the agricultural crisis of the mid-1980s. It was in 1986 that Congress passed Chapter 12 legislation as a mechanism to preserve agriculture and save the family farm, Hymas said.

"The essence of business is risk, agriculture faces a bunch of them," he said. "And God bless people who take risks because that's what's made America great. I have a lot of respect for people in agriculture."

Growers keep their eyes on private seed issue

ABERDEEN – Germination used to be the biggest worry a farmer had if he decided to plant wheat or barley from grain he'd grown the year before. Now it's legal ramifications from holding back seed from federally protected private varieties or running afoul of a contract that comes with a technologically-enhanced hybrid.

Idaho growers don't have the option of planting Roundup Ready wheat yet, but they are watching Monsanto's agreements with producers who plant Roundup Ready soybeans to see what the future holds.

The provision not to hold back seed for private use is one sticking point in these contracts, said Ed Souza. But the University of Idaho wheat breeder thinks the clause allowing Monsanto representatives to inspect a field for three years after seed is lost bought is potentially more troubling.

"There is concern about signing away rights of entry to a field for a long time," he said.

A landmark "seed piracy" lawsuit also hangs over the new technology. Monsanto has accused hundreds of farmers of replanting the company's patented, genealtered seeds in violation of a three-year-old rule that farmers buy seed fresh every year. Monsanto officials say the company must strictly enforce the "no replant" policy to recoup the millions of dollars spent developing the seeds. Monsanto estimates it takes 10 years and about $300 million to create commercial products like Roundup Ready soybeans and Bt corn. To recover this huge investment, the company has opted not to sell its engineered seeds but to "lease" them for one-time use only.

Eight simple rules for getting rich may be too simple but can still work

The Orange County Register

But is it?

In their book, "Getting Rich in America: 8 Simple Rules for Building a Fortune and a Satisfying Life," University of California, Irvine, professor McKenzie and his co-author present no-nonsense advice – much of it what your grandparents have probably been telling you for years. For example, get an education. Get married and stay married. Resist temptation.

Is building a fortune and a satisfying life really as simple as following eight basic rules?

What if you can only save $25 a month? What if you are in debt? What if you didn't start saving until late in life? What makes a life satisfying, anyway?

We went to McKenzie – who grew up an orphan, got an education, is raising a family, and has saved a million dollars – for some answers.

Q. I can't set aside a lot of money for savings. Can I still build a fortune by only saving $25 a month?

A. Yes – you can do it even on $25 a month. It means that a person earning the minimum wage would only be saving 2.8 percent of his or her income. A person earning the average American wage would only need to save 1 percent. We suggest that most Americans can do far better than that – with relative ease.

A person saving and investing such a meager sum from age 18 would still have more than $185,000 in net worth at retirement, more than 1 1/2 times the net worth of today's typical American retiree.

Q. How long is this going to take? My entire life?

A. Very little can be built overnight, and this certainly goes for building a respectable net worth. The longer you wait before starting to save, the tougher it gets.

To have a million dollars at retirement, a 22-year-old has to save only $6 a day. A 40-year-old has to save $28 a day. A 55-year-old, $135 a day. A 62-year-old ... don't ask.

Q. What do you mean by the "good life"?

A. Living so that, on reflection later in life, you can be proud of how you lived.

Money isn't everything, and shouldn't be, in life. Hot pursuit of money for its own sake will not likely make for much of a life, and we don't recommend it.

In our book, Dwight Lee and I pay a great deal of homage to building a sizable fortune by retirement time. We do that for a simple reason: You will need it to live in reasonable comfort in retirement.

A net worth of $1 million will only afford you a modest annual retirement income of $40,000 to $50,000 a year (after ensuring that you don't lose the value of your principal to inflation).

What we find interesting is that the rules for living a reasonable and satisfying life are remarkably compatible with the goal of building a sizable fortune.

Q. It's harder for me to own a home and build a nest egg than it was for my parents and grandparents. How can I still manage to do what they did?

A. Contrary to the widespread rumor that life has never been tougher for Americans, the opposite is true for the vast majority of Americans. We are living the dreams of our grandparents.

Almost everything we buy has gone up in terms of dollars, but most things have gone down in terms of the hours of work expended to get them, according to "Myth of Rich and Poor," by Michael Cox and Richard Alm.

Earning the price of a loaf of bread took six minutes in 1950. Today, it takes 3 1/2 minutes.

Yes, our houses are more expensive than what our grandparents saw, but the homes we buy today are larger and have more of everything – more bathrooms, bigger kitchens and garages, and better air conditioners.

Q. Won't I have to live like a miser to amass my fortune?

A. No, you don't. Not even if you earn only a modest income.

Look at the college graduate who takes her first job at age 22 at $30,000 a year and gets only a 1 percent raise after inflation each year for the rest of her working years. If she saves only 10 percent of her income and invests the funds in a Standard & Poor's index mutual fund, she should have a net worth of about $1.4 million at a retirement age of 67.

Keep in mind that very few Americans can get rich by their brains and brawn alone. They need the third leg of the stool, compound interest (or interest building on the interest that is earned). That means they must save and do so persistently, and then be patient.

Q. When do I need to start saving? Is it too late to start when I'm 50?

A. Take heart – late starters can do it. My co-author and I both started over at age 40, and we've done it. We've just had to be more aggressive in our saving. The biggest problem with waiting to save is that a late start requires that you be more adept at risk management – because risky investments are where the potential high rates of returns are. The later you start, the more risk you have to accept.

Q. Why do you feel a college education is so important? Microsoft's Bill Gates didn't finish college. If I start working now, I'll be saving for a longer time period.

A. A college education is not the obvious course to wealth for everyone, as Gates has proven. But it is a tried and true means by which many – ordinary Americans have been able to substantially raise their lifetime options and incomes.

Graduation from college has an unheralded benefit. It says to prospective employers: "This person has met the challenge."

In general, educated people tend to be healthier and to live longer. This means that they can work longer, save longer, and allow their fortune to compound for more years.

I sometimes tell my MBA students at UC Irvine that they shouldn't complain about the fees they pay. Even after allowing for the fees and their lost income while in school, their MBA degrees can easily add more than $3 million to their net worths at retirement.

Q. I'm in my 40s and don't have a college education, but do have a good job and steady income. Does this mean I won't succeed financially? I have friends who got degrees in history or art and they aren't necessarily better off than me.

A. Obviously you have succeeded financially, to a degree, and you can have a fortune at retirement.

As a rule, to build any given level of net worth, you will likely have to compensate for your lack of education in some way – more work, a higher savings rate, more denial, more risk taking, and so on.

Q. How do you save when you have teen-agers who want the latest fashions?

A. If you have modest means and insist on giving your kids everything they want now, you will be able to give them very little later. Moreover, you are sending them the wrong message about how they should save and take responsibility for their later years.

Parents who each year buy their children two pairs of $200 sneakers, instead of $40 sneakers, between the ages of 14 and 19 give up about $11,000 in potential retirement net worth.

Next time your teen-agers ask for a $200 pair of sneakers, give them a check for $200 and see what they buy. You might find out they really didn't want the expensive sneakers – when they had to pay.

Q. You say marriage and wealth go hand-in-hand. Why?

A. As a rule, married people (by which I mean people truly committed to their long-term relationship) tend to earn more. They also tend to be healthier, emotionally and physically, and they tend to live longer.

They have a greater incentive to invest in their mutual assets, simply because they do not have to worry (as much as uncommitted couples living together) about the other person walking out with ease with the family assets. All of this means that married people can save more, have longer careers, and allow their assets to compound for a longer period of time. A good marriage can literally add hundreds of thousands of dollars to a couple's net worth.

Chet Currier

NEW YORK – Tales of the swashbuckling world of Internet day-trading in stocks can be a real test of faith for any old-fashioned investor in mutual funds.

You're too conservative! You're missing out! When are you going to hook up to the future, where all the real money is?

Our purpose here today is to shore up your resolve a little, to provide the personal finance equivalent of a cold shower you can take whenever visions of instant wealth on the Web get your pulse beating too fast.

No matter what you read or hear, it is never easy to earn a sustained, worthwhile payoff as a short-term trader in any financial marketplace. You need skill, steady nerves and a big bankroll – and even in a bull market, the house odds work against you.

The long-term rise of the stock market, supported by economic growth, is a powerful force benefiting people who keep their money invested over time in funds or individual stocks. Once you start buying in the morning and selling in the afternoon, you are no longer riding this current, but trying to catch individual waves one by one.

Trading is also a much more expensive game than buy-and-hold investing. Yes, commissions on each transaction are much lower on most World Wide Web sites than they used to be in a conventional brokerage account. If you pay only $29 or $19 or even $9 to buy today, and the same amount to sell tomorrow, the stock may need to rise only slightly to get you your commission back.

Still, the more you trade, the faster the fees add up. To compound the problem, commissions aren't the only cost of trading. Each time you buy or sell, you also are faced with the challenge of getting the best possible price.

So you have to worry about whether the firm or system through which you operate provides the best possible "execution," in Wall Street parlance. Often, you also have to contend with the "spread" imposed by the broker or dealer who acts as a so-called market-maker in a stock.

Suppose you pick a stock where the spread is normally a quarter of a point. You put in your buy order yesterday, when the last reported price was $20, and you hit the sell button today, when the last reported price was $20.50.

When the going price yesterday was $20, chances are the dealer was offering to buy at 19.875 and sell at 20.125. So you wound up paying $20.125. When the going price today was $20.50, chances are the dealer was offering to buy at 20.375 and sell at 20.625. So you wound up receiving $20.375.

Ouch! Your profit per share, before taking commissions into account, was 25 cents, not 50 cents – half what a casual observer might have thought was there to be had.

When the market goes against you, and the stock falls to $19.50 instead of climbing to $20.50, the spread expands your loss. So, on what looks like about the same-sized move in a stock's price, you can lose three times as much as you might have made.

We haven't even mentioned taxes. Tax rates on short-term trading profits, which are treated as ordinary income, are generally higher than those on long-term gains from investments held for more than a year, which have a maximum rate of 20 percent.

Perhaps most troublesome of all, in short-term trading you may easily lose the protection of diversification. If your investments aren't diversified, one misstep in a stock that tanks can wipe out the gains from many winning moves.

Surely, you may say, some people are getting rich in this game! A few people are good enough, and a few others get lucky enough, at trading to make a big score – nowhere near as many, though, as the popular myths about day-trading would have you believe.

In any risk-taking venture, never underestimate your fellow humans' ability to exaggerate their success, not just in what they tell others but in the pictures they paint for themselves.

SOMETIMES EVEN THE BEST HOMES DON'T SELL.

If you are thinking about selling your house, it's important to consider the factors that directly influence the sale of your property. Determine the value of your house by evaluating: location, features, condition, age, today's market, recent sales, availability, types of financing and your time frames. Getting the best price for your house is a matter of achieving a balance between the maximum price you think you can get and selling your property within a reasonable length of time. Call 733-2265 X 19 or 886-2014 and ask for Jeanette Jeffries. I will prepare a free comparative market analysis to help you determine the best price for your property. Se Habla Espanol.

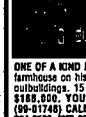
SOMETIMES EVEN THE BEST HOMES DON'T SELL.



If you are thinking about selling your house, it's important to consider the factors that directly influence the sale of your property. Determine the value of your house by evaluating: location, features, condition, age, today's market, recent sales, availability, types of financing and your time frame. Getting the best price for your home is a matter of achieving a balance between the maximum price you think you can get and selling your property within a reasonable length of time. Call 733-2365 X, 19 or 886-2014 and ask for Jeanette Jeffries. I will prepare a free comparative market analysis to help you determine the best price for your property. Se Habla Espanol.

Bobby Wolff

Dear Mr. Wolff:
We play limit major-suit raises to promise 9-11 HCP and four-card support. On occasion, would it be a serious mistake to offer a limit raise (raising one spade to three) with only three good trumps?
One Short, Kansas City, Mo.

ANSWER: The importance of a fourth trump cannot be overemphasized. Making a limit raise with only three-card support may not prove disastrous in many game auctions; however, if partner moves toward slam, that missing trump may make a huge difference.

Dear Mr. Wolff:
At rubber bridge, partner opened one spade, and next hand bid two clubs. I held ♠ 7-2, ♥ A-5-3, ♦ 10-6-3, ♣ Q-J-9-8-7. Should I have doubled?
Hungry Hal, Magnolia, Ark.

ANSWER: A penalty double with good trumps and few high cards is not a good idea. If the opponents run to another suit (they must have a better fit somewhere), what will you do when partner doubles? It's much better to pass over two clubs. If partner reopens with a double, then you can pass to give partner a better description of your holding.

Dear Mr. Wolff:
At duplicate, I held ♠ Q-7, ♥ A-J-10-6, ♦ A-K-Q-8-3, ♣ A-Q. How do you rate these possible opening bids: one diamond, two diamonds, two no-trump?
Matchpoint Hog, Thousand Oaks, Calif.

ANSWER: A panel of experts would probably choose a two-no-trump opening as the favorite (providing that 22 HCP falls with a serious mistake to offer a limit raise (raising one spade to three) with only three good trumps) range). Second-best opening would be one diamond, and a strong two-diamond opening would rate a poor third choice.

Dear Mr. Wolff:
At duplicate, LHO opened one heart, partner passed, and RHO jumped to four hearts. I ventured four spades, and LHO continued to five hearts, doubled by partner. Should I have passed, or should I have bid again with ♠ A-K-J-10-9-8, ♥ –, ♦ K-J-10-8, ♣ K-9-5?
Taking Charge, Twin Falls, Idaho

ANSWER: Partner's double is a warning for you not to bid further. Since you have defensive potential outside the spade suit, there is little reason for you not to respect partner's suggestion to defend.

Dear Mr. Wolff:
Partner opens one heart, and next hand doubles. What do I promise if I jump to three hearts?
Long Trumps, Spokane, Wash.

ANSWER: In standard methods, a redouble would promise strength and would ask opener to pass at his next turn. Therefore, a jump to three hearts does not promise much in high cards. It does promise four or five trumps and good distribution.

Does the wind make you spend time gathering them up out of neighbor's field?
If so contact us on how to save your own Solar Linear or Mini-Pivot system. You will find with these systems that the wind won't have the effect on them compared to what your using now. These are different types of Mini-Pivots. The Titan Solar Linear irrigates up to 80 acres. All power to run the Linear is supplied by the SUN. This is possible through photovoltaic solar panels and drop cycle storage batteries. This system's unique alignment keeps it running straight down the field. The length of the Linear is dependent on several factors such as acres irrigated, climactic conditions, soil conditions, available water and pressure. We would be glad to design a system to meet your specific needs to show you how to cut down labor cost with a Mini-Pivot.

Mousehunt - for real

A few months ago, an extended family of mice took up residence in my house and opened a haven for homeless rodents. It's taken me this long to bring myself to write about it.

For many weeks, I was in denial.

The first sign of trouble were the nuts. They were peanuts, in a basket by the fireplace, and they started appearing in a nearby sofa. Since we had kids in and out of the house, I wasn't overly concerned, though I hadn't actually seen anyone eating peanuts on the sofa.

Then I saw these little black things that looked like peppercorns under the kitchen sink. I couldn't remember garnishing a salad there – and I had no idea what mouse droppings looked like – so I chalked it up to strange things that happen underneath sinks that I don't want to know about.

LIFE AND TIMES
Denise Turner

Soon, my husband and I went away to a weekend conference. Daughter Becky came home from college, with a friend in tow, to stay with 13-year-old Steve.

We received a frantic call at the hotel. Becky had seen a mouse in the house and had come unglued. The threesome were camping on the living room floor in sleeping bags, listening for squeaks.

"Becky begged me to find this mouse and kill it," explained Steve, an obedient Boy Scout-to-the-rescue. "So I trapped it under a cushion and beat the cushion with a broom handle about a hundred times and Becky's friend helped me."

He continued, "When I lifted up the cushion, that silly Becky started crying because the mouse was dead and she felt sorry for it."

Suspecting that wouldn't be the end of the story, I started doing a little rodent research, while my husband went out to buy mousetraps. What I read was not encouraging.

If you see a mouse, you are probably housing at least a dozen of them, wrote the experts. (Are there mouse experts?) Within three weeks, a mouse can give birth to a dozen more, and traps will not solve the problem. You have to cut off the pests' food supply. And just in case you are like my daughter and tend to feel sorry for these little critters, you should know that I also read that mice are cannibalistic types who eat their children or their weaker siblings.

This is not Mickey and Minnie we are talking about.

I quit reading about mice when I got to the list of diseases they can cause – and the warning that they can gnaw on plumbing pipes and electrical wires, causing leaks and creating fire hazards.

About that time, I happened upon an episode of "The Brady Bunch," when the TV family found a mouse in their house. Actually, housekeeper Alice had spotted the creature and had called the exterminator, which was named "Zap It" or something. When the exterminator arrived, he told Alice he came quickly because, "I know how you ladies are." Alice was standing on a chair.

As Brady episodes go, the mouse turned out to be part of the boys' science project, and the cute little thing was saved and everyone was happy by the time the final credits rolled.

We ended up calling an exterminator, too, only to be told he had never seen so many mice in one crawl space. That made me feel really guilty, though I wasn't sure why, until the exterminator assured me that we were normal, because most of the houses on our street had become infested, too, due to new construction in nearby fields. If only he hadn't explained, in detail, how the poison he uses causes the mice to die. That was way more than I wanted to know.

At least the poison worked, and the only mouse left inside my house today is the one connected to our computer keyboard.

Last week, when I was trying to make friends with that mouse, I did a search for mice on the Internet. I found lots of mouse jokes: What kind of cereal do cats eat? Mice Krispies. What do cats call mice on skateboards? Meals on wheels.

Times-News writer

GOODING – Nita Thomas and her husband are building a new house, in spite – or maybe because – of the fact that they've been married for more than 40 years.

"He's doing the plumbing, and I went down in the basement to turn on the water. I yelled back up 'Are you sure you want this one?' He said yes, and a minute later I heard him screaming to turn it off. When I went upstairs, there was water all over.

"He said, 'Hand me your blanket and I'll mop up the mess.'" Thomas replied, "Mop it up with your own blanket."

One survey showed that refurbishing your home is the fifth-most stressful thing Americans dread – just behind divorce, death of a loved one and giving a speech to a bunch of strangers.

And yet home remodeling – do-it-yourself and contractor – is a $14 billion annual business in America, and homeowners spend an average of $8,000 per project. More than half of that is equity-financed.

Summer is the high-season for home renovation – and season is the appropriate word: It's often an ordeal.

"Many people are taken aback by the dust, dirt and disruption caused by a remodeling job," said Tom Philbin, a New York builder and author of "Now to Hire a Home Contractor Without Getting Chiseled" (St. Martin Griffin, $17.95). "When old stuff is taken out – tubs removed or walls or ceilings taken down – a lot of trash is created, but also a great deal of dirt and dirt."

Priority one is making sure that you and your spouse – and your contractor, if you're using one – are on the same page.

"As important as a contract may be, your biggest asset is your good relationship with your contractor," said Steve Thomas, author of the "This Old House" series of home improvement manuals.

Do-it-yourselfers can save up to 25 percent off the cost of hiring a contractor, Thomas says, but even home-handymen need to build in a contingency fund.

"You should plan your own contingency of 25 to 30 percent, as projects tend to get bigger once under way, not smaller."

Minding your business

As much as possible, you should try to be around when the job is being done at your home. It has a number of benefits:

- Concrete driveway. If you're not there, you won't know how deep the contractor poured the concrete. Is it the four inches contracted for, or three?
- Asphalt driveway. How thick was the mix? You have to be there to see.
- Wall insulation. To do this job correctly, shingles have to be removed, holes drilled through the sheathing, and the insulation pumped in. You can't know this is being done unless you're there.
- Paint job. If you've contracted for two coats, how can you know you're getting two? One heavy coat may cover the existing color – and you'll never know.
- Roof jobs. If repairs are required on the roof, how will you know they've been done unless you're there?
- Windows. If you've contracted to have insulation put in around those new windows, how will you know it's been done when all the trim is back in place?

– Source: "How to Hire a Home Improvement Contractor Without Getting Chiseled," by Tom Philbin (St. Martin's Griffin, $17.95)

What goes for money also applies to time, and that's particularly the case with bathrooms and kitchens – the two rooms that Americans are most likely to remodel.

"Expect disruption of the house," Philbin said. "If a kitchen is being redone, you can be sure of taking some meals in restaurants, and you may be without a toilet for some time."

"It's often faster and cheaper to plan on gutting a bathroom and starting from scratch than trying to work around old fixtures, floors and plumbing in order to try to save a few bucks," Thomas writes in "This Old House Bathrooms" (Little, Brown and Company, $24.95).

That's why it's necessary to find a contractor with a track record you can check– and put everything in writing.

"With a bit of homework, the average person can learn enough to benefit him or herself in a variety of ways," Philbin said.

Stay in touch with the contractor, and if conditions change enough to cost you more money, then consider rewriting the contract.

And if you're doing the job yourself, make sure you know what you're in for.

"Alas, the bathroom is full of corners."

Coping with the remodel mess

By The Associated Press

Rare is the family that can move out when major remodeling is being done on the home. Here are some tips on making the experience go more smoothly:

• Empty rooms completely and get the furniture and other items out of the way.

That way, we can empty the affected rooms instead of piling everything into the other rooms, which makes them unusable," says Doug Dervin, a contractor in West Hempstead, N.Y., and president of the New York/Long Island chapter of the National Association of the Remodeling Industry.

Container prices vary. In the Long Island area, the cost is about $200 a month, Dervin says.

• Shield the rest of the house from the mess. To isolate the area being worked on, ask the contractor to install a plastic wall with a zipper door. Heavy-duty sheeting can be used over carpeting and wood floors. There is even a paint product that protects a tub while the tile is going up around it. When the job is done, the painted protection can be peeled off like rubber.

• Anticipate dislocation for about two weeks for a bathroom and up to a month for a kitchen.

"Go on vacation or try to stay at a relative's house for the critical period," Dervin suggests.

• There is no single "best" time of the year to remodel.

"In winter, business is slower, and we can put more workers on your job, but the weather can slow us down," Dervin says. "Summer when the weather is good is the busiest time of the year, so projects take longer."

• Take those contractor estimates on the time required to complete the project with a grain of salt.

"If the contractor says two months, allow for three," Dervin says.

Strategies to think of when remodeling to sell your home

The Associated Press

Unless you're in a truly "hot" market area, you need to go through some preliminaries – and perhaps make repairs – to get your house in condition to command top dollar when you sell it. Forget the advice about stage-managing the aroma of cookies or bread to allure buyers, says Kenneth Austin, chairman of the HouseMaster home inspection chain. "It won't work if your home has troubling problems.

"A home owner who wants or needs to sell a home fast should consider the factors that will make the house attactive to potential buyers," he says. "What we're talking about is making your house a good 'deal' – one that doesn't necessarily come from a quick coat of paint in the living room or new hardware on the kitchen cabinets, but rather with a fair market price based on the home's condition."

Look at your home through a buyer's eyes, he advises. Perhaps you've learned to live with your leaky shower. Or since you come in through the garage or side door, you may not often think about the peeling paint, loose gutter, or crumbling walkway that leads to the front door.

"This may not seem like a big deal to someone who has lived in a home for twenty-plus years, but it can be a real turnoff to the buyer who is about to shell out a quarter-of-a-million dollars."

Getting an unbiased appraisal by a professional home inspector can give you a handle on the pluses and minuses of your property and let you set a realistic price that will inspire a quicker sale.

"You'll also have the opportunity to repair anything major, eliminating the chance that the buyer will uncover it later on at a more critical time in the deal," Austin says.

"Since the inspection also give you the option of adjusting the price according to the condition stated in the inspection report, it gives the seller more options than just waiting for a buyer's home inspection to raise the issue of deficiences."

Austin lists some of the biggest turnoffs to potential buyers:

• Poor physical appearance, including dirty, peeling paint, loose railings at the front door, broken doorbell, unkempt lawn and landscaping, cracked or loose bricks, driveway or steps. Dirty dishes in the sink and unwashed windows also turn off buyers. "If your house looks unloved, you make it difficult for someone else to love it."

• Obvious plumbing problems. A dark brown stain on the ceiling of the room below your bathroom will alarm most buyers, even if the original problem has been fixed. Neglected bathrooms with cracked, stained or loose tiles, mildew, crunchy floors, low water pressure, old, cracked or chipped fixtures, loose toilets, bathtub rot and dripping faucets will have the buyer looking elsewhere.

• Water in the basement. Any signs of water or wet in the basement – water marks on the walls, dank, musty odors and mildew will trouble a buyer.

• Dingy kitchens. Dirty appliances, loose handles, missing components of appliances, worn countertops, old stained sinks, poor flooring and bad lighting make a poor impression about one of the most-used rooms of the house.

• A chilly house. A cold house in early spring will make potential buyers uninterested in the property. Either your thermostat is too low, or the heating system has a problem. The same goes for a house that's too hot in the summer – particularly in hot-weather climates where cooling systems are a key element in any house.

Chicken Soup for the Soul

By Susan White

Susan White learns every day from and cherishes the wonderful ways our animals are models of living life to the fullest, loving unconditionally, embracing the passion within and being completely in the present moment.

My husband, Daniel, and I travel frequently. When we first got our dog, Buddha-tu, we were concerned that he would be lonely, or perhaps he'd feel that we'd abandoned him when we left him at home during our trips away. When we left, we always had someone stay in our house and look after Buddhi.

We knew he was well taken care of, but we still felt guilty. I even used to leave my husband's T-shirt for Buddhi to sleep with and made sure he got extra goodies each day we were gone. Still, I used to wonder what he made of the whole thing - did he miss our affection, "his rub-a-dubs and belly pats," sleeping by our bed and taking walks with us? Who was going to play ball with him while we were away? Was our absence too traumatic for him? I supposed I would never know.

But then one night when we called home, Buddhi made it quite clear what he missed the most when we were gone. We reached our house sitter, Barbara, and had her put us on the speakerphone so that we could talk to Buddhi.

He immediately started barking and howling when he heard our voices. We were jabbering at Buddhi like a pair of fools when we noticed we couldn't hear him anymore.

Barbara told us that he had run out of the room. "What was he doing?" I wondered uneasily. Maybe it hadn't been such a good idea to call home - perhaps Buddhi was confused and was searching the house for us.

When he couldn't find us, would he become upset and try to get outside to continue the search? What if he tried to jump through a window? My imagination was running away with me, and I couldn't stop it. I thought, "Poor baby, he misses us so much, hearing our voices had just made it worse." I urged Barbara to go and find him. My husband and I decided to try and coax him back into the room by continuing to talk to him.

Barbara ran after him to see what was going on and almost tripped over him as he raced back into the room, holding something in his mouth. He bounded to the phone, while we were still spouting endearments in a highly embarrassing manner.

We heard Barbara laughing in the background, and then she picked up the phone and told us that Buddhi had approached the phone and had stood for a moment, head cocked. Then he carefully put his front paws up on the desk and set down the object in his mouth. It was his favorite ball.

He put it directly on top of the speakerphone and stepped back - waiting for us to throw it.

Out-of-control teens take advantage

Chicago Tribune

CHICAGO — Laurie Wheeler of LaGrange Park would not dream of allowing her 17-year-old son to drink alcohol at home. The problem is, the mother of one of her son's friends not only permits drinking, she also adds girls to the equation in the form of coed sleepovers.

That might sound a little more like a Las Vegas vacation than a parental philosophy, and Wheeler would say that it is neither a good gamble nor good parenting.

"She decided to be their friend," Wheeler said of the mother. "She feels that the kids drink anyway, so she lets them drink at home. She used to be zero-tolerance, like I am. I told her I'm not comfortable with my kid staying there anymore."

School counselors say they are seeing more and more of this kind of parenting or, as they call it, enabling. That is, parents enable their children to behave poorly by removing the consequences of children's actions. A standard parental reaction to underage drinking would be to ground a child, but if that consequence is removed, a teen is likely to find the next level of consequences outside a parent's control: arrest, a wrecked car or worse.

"I work with a lot of parents whose kids are in trouble," she said.

"What we're talking about is this idea that we don't hold our kids to the natural consequences, and I think it has something to do with the fear that our kids won't love us."

The sin of enabling need not involve such weighty behaviors as alcohol or coordinator at New Trier High School in Winnetka, pointed out that a more common example is a parent writing a note for a child who fails to finish a school project, saying the child was sick when in fact the student simply didn't get to it in time. The message to the child is,

Dailey has seen this approach taken to the extreme. "I just had an interview with a boy who is 14 and who smokes weed at home because his parents think it's safer," she said. "That way his parents know he's not out drinking."

"But I think kids want to know that we set limits," Dailey added. "Kids oftentimes enjoy being able to say, 'I can't do it because my mom won't let me.' One of the saddest things I see is a kid who comes in and says, 'I use drugs with my parents.' If you let them drink, they're going to smoke dope, and if you let them smoke dope, they are going to try something harder. They want a way to push out from you."

The psychology of it all is not lost on teens. A group of seniors was questioned on the subject at Glenbrook South High School in Glenview, Ill. Though fighting like trial attorneys to stake out their rights as 17- and 18-year-olds, they conceded that they would have to question the love of a parent who dropped all barriers on behavior.

Addressing the issue of alcohol in the home, Erin Chikaraishi, 18, said: "It's never been an issue in my household, but by having the parents do it with you, it's encouraging it. It's making it seem like it's OK."

Classmate Erin Sullivan, 18, said that though she considers her parents strict, "As much as we don't like to admit it, a lot of what parents do they do because they care about us."

No lie: Kids' fibs are normal

The Stamford Advocate

Sound familiar? Your son boasts to pals that his dad plays for the New York Yankees. Your daughter tells the teacher her book report will be late because it was ravaged by baby Mikey.

While your kids may spin some mighty tales, there is no need to press the panic button right away, declare child experts. Children's fabrications, they say, are a normal part of child development. With younger kids, it's the "Who ate the cookies?" "Not me" scenario. Children between ages 2 and 5 may not make a firm differentiation between fantasy and reality, child experts note. If a young child wishes or imagines something to be true, that desire can be as convincing as the truth. In turn, he or she tells an innocent untruth.

But fibbing also can be children's way of "testing their power over the world," says Stamford, Conn., child and family therapist Christopher Bogart, who believes lying helps kids develop their own identities. For the younger child, he says "(lying) tests their individuality and whether the people around them can read their minds.

Who hasn't heard the resourceful cover-ups of young mischief-makers, the exaggerations mouthed by fragile egos or the bogus promises of youngsters currying favor with adults?

"I would say all kids at some point do tell lies," says Evan Imber-Black, a Stamford marriage and family therapist. The difficulty comes, she says, when kids lie regularly, and that's when it's important to find out what's going on in their lives.

Kate Cohen-Posey says lying came easily to her as a plucky 9-year-old who loved to explore an underground maze of drainage pipes near her home. Afterward, when her parents asked where she had been, she'd tell them she was at a friend's house. Lying was natural because it paid off, recalls Cohen-Posey, a Lakeland, Fla., psychologist.

Single parents must answer dating question

The Gazette

The dating thicket is sticky even for the unencumbered.

Toss in a child and the debris of a broken relationship and dating can be arduous, even inadvisable. Single parents who forget their children's perspectives will remember them quickly when a young person stammers,

Law, 51, is proud of the job he has done raising his son, 11, almost on his own. But he's troubled by the hunch that raising a child has inhibited his finding a woman to love.

Though he's dated, he says, fatherhood hasn't allowed him the time or situation in which to meet Ms. Right.

"Trying to balance the two is extraordinarily difficult," he said. "I haven't really figured it out."

To date or not to date? That is the question, at least for recently separated parents or singles with children.

And as the number of American males with sole custody has more than doubled since 1980, it's a question baffling both sexes.

For someone just out of a long-term relationship, dating can be like flying without wings.

"When I first divorced, (it was) really hard to figure out what to do," said Calgary native Jackie Smith, founder of the singleparent.com Web site and dating service. "You haven't dated for maybe 10 or more years.

Colorado Springs resident Lynda Hunter, editor of Single Parent Family magazine and herself a single mother, has dated sparingly since she and her husband split 14 years ago.

The responsibility of raising three children, she says, has kept dating from being an active option. "The ones that I did (date) were disastrous. I would have been better off waiting as they passed by."

Expert: Boys need emotional outlet

The Providence Journal

WARWICK, R.I. — Dan Kindlon paints a clear picture of how differently parents deal with their sons and daughters.

Imagine, he said, if a little girl walked out of her parents' bedroom wearing her father's clothes — tie, shoes, hat. Most parents would consider the sight irresistibly cute, and probably take photographs, Kindlon pointed out.

But consider if a young boy did the same thing, but this time dressed in his mother's clothes. Kindlon's assessment that the reaction from most parents would probably be a little less than enthusiastic struck a nerve with his audience yesterday, as most shook their heads in agreement or offered knowing chuckles.

The example was meant to illustrate how boys are trained to be tough and stoic, while girls are allowed to keep their emotional spouts open. The result is young boys who are helpless when it comes to dealing with emotions, a frightening prospect for society and the kids themselves that often results in violence, he said.

"Boys get to the point where they're overwhelmed by emotion ... and they can't handle it," he said. "And they only have one outlet."

He holds joint assistant professorships in the psychiatry department of the Harvard Medical School and the department of maternal and child health care at the Harvard School of Public Health. His audience yesterday included teachers, school administrators and public and mental health experts.

The specter of recent school shootings in Littleton, Colo.; Conyers, Ga., and other cities throughout the country was a backdrop to Kindlon's speech. He said teachers and parents should use the focus now being placed on stemming school violence as an opportunity to implement change.

He said he has seen boys who have begun to travel the path that led the two shooters at Columbine High to violence. But in sessions where the boys were taught to dissect their emotions and explain how they felt, they became comfortable with society again, he said.

Kindlon also said studies into why boys commit violence should be focused more on their socialization than their biological makeup. He cited a study that showed boys who achieve the most in school often have higher levels of testosterone, a hormone responsible for development of male secondary sex characteristics, than those who are often in trouble.

He also said the focus should be on socialization because that's the area that can be changed.

Technology transforms vacation into an extension of your work

The Dallas Morning News

The head of her own public relations agency, Posner says she hasn't taken a vacation since 1987. The 48-year-old Chicagoan always carries two pagers, a cell phone in her purse and two more in her car. Two years ago, a male friend broke up with her, she says, because her inability to take time off "drove him nuts."

Planning your own summer vacation these days? Before you cluck your tongue at Posner, you should know that she's not that unusual. Charley Wilkison of Austin took his wife and three kids to Disney World last Christmas. Along with his pager, cell phone and laptop – to keep tabs on his work as a lobbyist for Texas law enforcement agencies.

Your own trips may suffer from the desire (or need) to turn recreation into something more like work, school or church. People who cram their holidays full of self-improvement or fitness courses, factory supervisors who vacation with office files, employees who find themselves tethered by phone at the beach: This is America trying to relax.

The travel industries are booming. Airlines sold a record $46 million tickets last year. We may be traveling more, but according to the American Automobile Association, we're taking shorter trips: In the past decade, the average vacation has dwindled from four days to three. Janie Graziani, public relations manager for AAA, declares the two-week vacation dead. Too many of us fear staying away from work too long, she says.

Many observers attribute all of this to the new information economy and its accelerating, global demands. There may be something to that: American workers' productivity the past decade has been the envy of the world, a chief source of our economic good times. But while business executive stock compensation is off the charts, employee salaries and vacation times have remained comparatively unchanged.

Accordingly, workplace pressure has ratcheted up. We're working harder at a faster pace – and with low unemployment, there seems to be no one with the right training who can be hired to help us out.

Not surprisingly, many people "have the false notion that dropping out of the rat race for a few weeks is going to impair their ability to keep up," says Jeff Davidson, author of "The Joy of Simple Living" (Rodale, $27.95). "The irony is that no one can keep up."

But turning vacations into more work is actually a tradition in this country; it's not just a development of the '90s. In her new study, "Working at Play: A History of Vacation in the United States" (Oxford, $35), Cindy Aron, a history professor at the University of Virginia, argues that Americans have always looked askance at taking time off:

"There is something basic in our character that distrusts just ... goofing off. We deride people as couch potatoes, lazy welfare cheats or the idle rich. Accurate or not, these images express a resentment toward anyone who isn't punching the clock, sharing the burden, bustling toward that rewarding cerebral hemorrhage at the office."

"Working at Play" actually follows two paths in chronicling Americans uneasy at play. The first is the history one might expect from the last 150 years. It's the story of change and expansion and new travel technologies as America ceased to be agricultural and became urban. We built trains, cars and planes. The multi-billion-dollar vacation industry developed from resorts and outdoor camps.

Regular vacations spread from the rich to the white middle class. Only by the middle of this century were they begrudgingly awarded to immigrants or the working class.

But the other story Aron found is one of long-standing consistency. The dilemmas about leisure and work that we Americans wrestled with 150 years ago are pretty much the ones we face today. If work gives our lives meaning, then what does leisure do? Is there any justification for vacations – or are they just a sop to keep employees contented, returning us refreshed and ready for the grindstone?

"As I researched this material," Aron says, "this story kept surfacing over and over, and it wasn't what I initially expected."

Amy answers kids' questions about the World Wide Web

Dear Amy: What is the best search engine that's OK for kids? —Lauren, Sanford, Conn.

Dear Lauren: Unfortunately, search engines return so much weird stuff that kids should ask their parents' permission before they do a search. Luckily, there are some sites just for kids such as CoolSpot at http://www.klick.com/spots/ that link you up to kid-friendly sites. The good news is that most of the major search sites are developing filtered or kid-safe versions for young surfers. At Search Engine Watch, there's a great page called "Kids Search Engines" at http://www.searchenginewatch.com/links/kids.html It describes what to expect at each site and has more links for parents about Web safety.

Dear Amy: How can I make the address of my Web page www.brianspage.com? —Brian, Nashua, N.H.

Dear Brian: You want a domain name. A domain name is a unique Web address made up of common words so it is easier to remember. To get a domain name, first search to see if someone else already has it at http://www.networksolutions.com/purchase/ If the name is not used, contact your ISP and ask what steps to take to get a domain name for your Web page. Some ISPs charge an extra fee for this service.

Learning hard way can teach lesson

Parents of the sort who read this column are concerned, conscientious, caring and committed. They are certainly well-intentioned, but none of the above guarantees they are doing the right things.

These parents love their children, but not all love is equal. Just as it is possible to discipline wrongly, it is possible to love wrongly. Many well-intentioned parents, unfortunately, love their children deeply and wrongly at the same time. Like their discipline, their love is weak, rather than strong.

Weak love is indulgent, permissive, appeasing. Parents who love weakly generally expect a lot of themselves and relatively little of their child. They want the child to make good grades in school, for example, but they ensure the good grades by sitting with the child as he does his homework, guiding his every move. That harms the child more than it helps him.

PARENTING
John Rosemond

Out of misplaced love, mind you.

Weak love is also afraid of making the child upset, afraid of hearing the child yell either "You don't love me!" or "I hate you!"

Strong love, by contrast, is empowering, but the child may not like it. The parent whose love is strong understands that children must learn certain things the hard way, through lonely encounters with adversity and by making mistakes. Strong love is there to protect, but realizes that adversity is not reason enough for protection.

Strong love helps a child stand on his own two feet. Weak love lets the child stand on its feet. Strong love requires the child to lie in the beds he makes. Weak love lies in the child's beds. Strong love lets the child stew in his own juices. Weak love stews in the child's juices. Strong love is supportive, but requires the child to fight his own battles. Weak love fights the child's battles.

Here's a story about strong love: My mother has a Ph.D. in plant morphology, an esoteric life science. She is brilliant, and her brilliance extends to matters of math. One day when I was in about fifth grade, I came to her complaining about a math problem that was giving me trouble. She looked at my math book, noted that the concept was still being taught the way she learned it, and handed the book back to me.

"I figured this out when I was your age," she said. "You can too."

"Mom!" I protested. "I've been working on it for almost 30 minutes!"

"Oh," she replied, "you're telling that to the wrong person. I've been working on some problems for five years now and still haven't solved them."

And with that, Mom dismissed me with an imperious gesture like the Queen of England.

On those occasions, she forced me to learn that I was capable of solving my own problems. She already knew that about me. I needed to learn it about myself.

You can't bring out the best in a child by just telling him he's capable. You have to make him discover his capabilities, and doing that requires that he struggle, courtesy of a parent who supports his struggles, but does not struggle for him. Strong love, tough love, you can call it what you will. It's real love.

'Austin Powers' is more geared toward older youngsters

Family flicks

• "Austin Powers: The Spy Who Shagged Me" (PG-13) – Twin Cinema, Century Cinema of Burley, Jerome Cinema, Magic Lantern of Ketchum.

Best for: Adults

What it's about: Austin Powers (Mike Myers), the very hip and groovy spy, returns to the '60s to get his virility back from Dr. Evil (also played by Myers) in this sequel to 1997's "Austin Powers: International Man of Mystery." On his journey he comes up against a 700-pound Scotsman named Fat B— (also played by Myers), a 32-inch-tall clone of Dr. Evil named Mini-Me (Verne Troyer) and a CIA operative named Felicity Shagwell (Heather Graham). Robert Wagner is back as Dr. Evil's "No. 2" and Rob Lowe plays the younger No. 2. Seth Green, Kristen Johnston and Dr. Evil's cat Mr. Bigglesworth also star.

The good: Myers' ability to portray several characters, give them all funny and different personalities and bring them all together in a story that pokes fun at spy movies like "Dr. No" and "In Like Flint" is what makes the movie entertaining. Baby boomers may also recognize a bit of Monty Python humor sprinkled in. Is this a funny movie? Yes! Myers is hilarious and does a brilliant job of poking fun not only at the movies, clothing and vocabulary we used to take seriously back in the '60s and '70s but also at virility.

The not-so-good: Because of the sexual innuendo, it's not a family comedy parents should take their kids to. The language contains mostly irreverent British slang, there are several funny but overtly sexual situations, the opening musical number features Powers dancing through the streets of Paris with nothing on, and there are several other scenes with barely clad women dancing around. Because this is a comedy that's a conglomeration of spoofs on spies and sex, it obviously is going to be a sexually themed movie.

Offensive language: Yes, but it's British slang that has a more irreverent meaning in England than it does here.

Sex: There's a bed scene that Graham has with Fat B— that's more disgusting (food in the folds of his skin; he spits on her) than sexy. Another scene has Johnston (as Ivana Humpalot) in bed with Powers but both are clothed; there are numerous other sexual references and dialogue, and skimpy costumes.

Parental advisory: Is this a movie for kids? No! The problem with kids seeing this movie is that they miss the adult sexual overtones in the dialogue, but repeat the lines to their peers and add them to their vocabulary. This is a movie that mature teens will find funny, but even they won't get all the jokes and cynical references.

Entertainment value: B+

• "Entrapment" (PG-13) – Older teen-age girls are among the target audience for this flick, but others will wish it had more action and less romance. The amorous scenes between Sean Connery and Catherine Zeta-Jones are definitely along PG lines, although the camera clearly relishes Zeta-Jones' lithe body. The PG-13 rating is primarily for language. (Reel Theater of Twin Falls, Motor-Vu Drive-in of Twin Falls, Gooding Cinema)

• "Instinct" (R)– This is a movie mature teens will appreciate. (Twin Cinema, SkiTime Cinemas of Ketchum)

• "The Mummy" (PG-13) – If your kids are already predisposed to cheer, they'll probably do so here. The mummy is ravenous and hostile, but he's not altogether scary. However, the film has ample gross-out moments involving man-eating bugs. (124 minutes) (Twin Cinema, Liberty Theater of Hailey)

• "Notting Hill" (PG-13) – This one has all the earmarks of a great date flick. Parents should know that it contains a few naughty words and does not take a tsk-tsk attitude toward pre-marital sex. Instead, it takes a warm and accepting view toward human nature, in all its unpredictable whims. Notting Hill tells the story of a mild-mannered book merchant (Hugh Grant) whose life is turned upside down when a famous movie star (Julia Roberts) walks into his shop. They fall in love, but there are complications along the way. (125 minutes) (Reel Theater of Twin Falls, Century Cinema of Burley, Magic Lantern of Ketchum)

• "October Sky" (PG) – It's tough to find a film that really merits that shopworn phrase "ideal family entertainment." But that's just what this film is. Steering clear of stuffiness and sanctimony, it offers something for all members of the family. The movie focuses on the 1957 Sputnik flight, which inspires teen-ager Homer Hickam to design a rocket. (108 minutes) (Burley Theater)

• "Star Wars I: The Phantom Menace" (PG) – The younger your kids, the more they will enjoy this adventure. One of the film's heroes is 9-year-old Anakin Skywalker, and he gets to enter one of the most exciting action scenes in the entire George Lucas canon. Parents may have trouble explaining to their younger children that this likable young boy grows up to be the nefarious Darth Vader. Most of the violence is of a bloodless, comic-strip manner, not meant to be taken seriously. (130 minutes) (Twin Cinema, Century Cinema of Burley, Jerome Cinema, Sun Valley Opera House)

• "10 Things I Hate About You" (PG-13) – Sex is present, but only in mild conversation. In fact, there's little in this teen comedy to overtly offend anyone but those who are looking to be overtly offended. Some salty language – teens have been known to use it – and sexual dialogue are the only real red flags. And the message of being true to yourself is a good one. (94 minutes) (Motor-Vu Drive-in of Twin Falls)

• "The Thirteenth Floor" (R)– This is obviously an adult sci-fi movie that's too intense and confusing for older children. Save your money and time. (Reel Theater of Twin Falls)

• "William Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream" (PG-13) – Students who desire an easy introduction to Shakespeare will appreciate this lavish version of the romantic fantasy, which is marred by uneven acting and pacing. Some sexual innuendo and nudity. (116 minutes) (The Orpheum of Twin Falls, Ski Time Cinemas of Ketchum)

Fatherhood has changed over the ages

The Dallas Morning News

Long ago, there wasn't a special day to thank fathers for all the care they give their children.

But even longer ago, anthropologists believe, fathers didn't give their children any care at all.

Fathers became dads sometime early in the evolution of humans, the standard theory goes, because feeding and protecting the kids helped their genes get passed on to future generations. The theory holds that men had a good idea which kids were theirs.

But some experts now argue that men may not have been so sure. Even today, they point out, some cultures believe babies can have more than one father – every man who contributes sperm during a woman's pregnancy is also considered a biological dad.

If the earliest humans also believed there were multiple dads, then scientists may have to develop a different rationale to explain the evolution of fatherhood, said Steven Beckerman, an anthropologist at Penn State University in University Park.

"The assumption that men actually adhere to the standard model just doesn't hold true," Beckerman said.

Beckerman studies the Bari, an indigenous hunter-gatherer society in Venezuela. The Bari's main food is manioc, or cassava, a starchy root that provides some, but not all, necessary nutrients. The Bari depend on men to provide fish and game, which have nutrients especially important for growing children.

Anthropologists, of course, don't know what early humans were like. But people like the Bari may be a good approximation.

"We study these people to help us develop hypotheses of what might have happened," said Kristen Hawkes, an anthropologist at the University of Utah in Salt Lake City.

Beckerman says the idea that a child can have multiple fathers exists in at least 18 distinct cultures in South America, as well as others in New Guinea and in India.

The Bari believe that a pregnancy can't continue without repeated anointments with sperm. Some women have sex with their husbands during pregnancy, and about two-thirds have sex with other men, too. The husbands don't seem to object, Beckerman says.

When the babies are born, the mothers name the men as the children's secondary fathers. These secondary fathers, along with the primary fathers, are expected to provide fish and game to the children.

It turns out that the arrangement is beneficial for the kids, Beckerman and his colleagues have found. Only 64 percent of children without secondary fathers live to age 15, compared with 80 percent of kids with secondary fathers.

Beckerman says the idea that a child can have multiple fathers exists in at least 18 distinct cultures in South America, as well as others in New Guinea and in India.

The widely accepted model for how fathers started caring for their families has its roots in studies of chimps, one of the closest living relatives to human beings. Human ancestors, many scientists believe, were similar to today's chimps.

Chimp fathers don't care for their young at all. And it wouldn't make much sense for them to do so because they probably don't know who their kids are. Female chimps mate with many males, so males can't be sure which kids are theirs. The earliest humans might have had the same arrangement.

But as the human line evolved, certain changes may have encouraged males to hang around more. Newborn chimps are further developed than newborn humans. So as newborns on the human line became more helpless, more parental care was needed to ensure the babies' survival.

Another difference between chimps and humans is the fertility of females. Males can tell when female chimps are fertile, and therefore need to be present only at those times. But with early female humans, who began to "hide" their fertile periods, males in theory did well to stay nearby to ward off other males. This became a better way of ensuring that their own genes were passed on. In exchange for females' fidelity, men would provide food for the families they knew were theirs.

Beckerman suggests, however, that being certain of fatherhood is not the only way to get your genes passed on. The Bari may be doing it in a different manner.

"The fact that you have this system of secondary fatherhood doesn't mean that people's genetic interests are completely irrelevant," he said. Among the Bari, it may be that "all the people are still serving their own genetic interests in at least some way."

Adult clothing retailers look to younger set

Knight Ridder News Service

It may be for children, but don't call it kid stuff.

Adult apparel retailers are taking their first, tentative steps to expand into the $30 billion kid's clothing market. The new entries in children's apparel are aiming for affluent parents who delayed having children to establish careers – and bank accounts.

Taking the lead from Gap Inc., which grew to roughly 670 GapKids' locations from its first store in 1985, retailers, including Abercrombie & Fitch Co. and the Limited Inc., are zeroing in on kids to cultivate lifelong customers.

Life and times in the year 999: marriage vows

The Washington Post

In most parts of Europe in 999, one became a legal adult at 12. If you lived in an area still following old German customs, you only had one name — a practice that has made it difficult for historians to trace family lines in many places.

Marriage, widespread even among enslaved serfs, was allowed as early as 14 for boys and 12 for girls but averaged about 20 to 24 for men and 14 to 16 or later for women. A restricted or fat-poor diet delays the onset of menstruation, which probably arrived about age 15 for peasant girls in many 10th-century cultures. So it is not surprising that average age at marriage was considerably older than the official ecclesiastical minimum.

The wedding ceremony, though usually blessed by a priest, would have been local and secular. The church didn't have formal marriage rites until the 12th century.

DEAR ABBY
Abigail VanBuren

DEAR READERS: Several years ago, Richard H. Kent, a retired colonel who served in the U.S. Air Force, sent me a poem he'd written as a tribute to his father. I have kept it in my book of special treasures. Today I'm sharing it in honor of fathers, stepfathers and grandfathers everywhere. Read on:

A Belated Grace
By Kent, Springfield, Va.

Make me half the man my father was
And I'll know that I've been blest.
Give me half his courage and loving care
And a kingdom I'll possess.

When I was young and foolish
I heard but I didn't hear
His words of wisdom, his sound advice,
The need to persevere.

When I grew older and wiser,
I saw what I hadn't seen:
His strength to cope with adversity
And do it with dignity.

No need for the Ten Commandments
When I came to a fork in the road.
I had only to think what he would have done
And again, he'd carry my load.

Make me half the father to my two sons
As the father he was to me.
And I know that I will rest at peace
Throughout eternity.

DEAR ABBY: Your columns about random acts of kindness prompt this letter. I'd like to tell you about some people I'll never forget.

I was taking the train to Oklahoma from Chicago for my Christmas vacation during World War II. I stood on the platform while all the servicemen boarded, and soon the train was packed. The conductor leaned out, announced, "There is no room for you!" and closed the door. I was standing in the snow and it was getting dark, and all I could think of was, "Will I ever get home?"

Then a couple of the cooks leaned out of the dining car and said I could ride with them. They had such wonderful smiles and laughs. They pulled me up, put an apron on me, and sat me beside a big, warm, pot-bellied stove. After they had served everyone else, they cooked a wonderful meal for me. It was so much fun.

When we arrived in St. Louis, they took my luggage and we ran through all the steam until we found the train going to Oklahoma. I'll never forget them, and think of them often.

– ANN IN CALIFORNIA

DEAR ANN: You must be a person "of a certain age" to remember train travel when the industry was in its glory. Those were wonderful times.

The dining car staff was generous to take you under their wing, and you probably received better service than any other passenger.

If this is called "mooning," what is it called when a woman lifts up her blouse and shows her bare breasts?

AFTER CLASS
Gay Petersen

My Dad was a farmer. He farmed all his life, starting on my grandfather's farm when he was just a child.

Farming for him started with horses, and only when I was about six years old did he get his first tractor. Was he proud! I can still remember the day the tractor arrived, a little A, and how all of us climbed up on the tractor to sit in his lap and have our pictures taken.

My Dad was hard working and an excellent farmer, even with the rocky land he had to work. Plus – he milked cows morning and night, so he was very busy, but never too busy for his wife and children. Mom came first for Dad, and theirs was a lifelong love affair.

We children came in a close second, and he was never too busy for us. He and Mom never missed a play, a baseball game or any function, church or school, that we were in. Besides he took the time to play catch with us in the evenings, take us with him on the tractor, and he often took us fishing.

All of this – in the days when fathers were mainly workers and disciplinarians who weren't supposed to play with children – that was a mother's prerogative. But my Dad didn't seem to know he was supposed to fit into a certain mold. He just loved us and took time to show us that love.

He died of a heart attack when I was only 27, and I miss him still. Everyone should have a father like I was privileged to have. And so on this Father's Day, though I think of my Dad every day of the year, I give him a special tribute. He was a true inspiration to all of us.

Thanks, Dad.

Fathers are so important in the lives of their children. We often put a great deal of emphasis on mothers, and indeed they deserve a great deal of credit for being the primary care givers of their children, but my what an influence a good dad can have.

Certainly dads must work and are, most often, the primary providers in the home, but todays dads seem to want to spend more quality time with their children, showing how strength, goodness and kindness can play equal parts in making a good adult.

Of course we have some bad examples of fathers who do not care, who are uninterested in their children's well-being, who are sometimes even cruel.

But the majority of dads I see today, including my own sons-in-law are ideal dads in every sense of the word – hard working, yet taking the time to be an integral part in raising their children to be the kind of adults that will contribute to society.

And, because children follow by example, the exmples these fine men have set will be passed on.

Happy Father's Day to all you great fathers who are doing your best. God bless you all.

SOCIAL SECURITY Q & A

Knight Ridder News Service

Q. I'm thinking about retiring next year. Is it too soon for Social Security to compute my monthly benefit?

A. When you're thinking about retirement, we recommend that you talk to a Social Security representative in the year before you plan to retire.

Since your Social Security benefit is about 42 percent of your earnings averaged over your working lifetime, the figure you will be provided with is an estimate. For more information, you can call our toll-free number, 1-800-772-1213.

Q. We have just been told that our baby is blind. Do we qualify for Social Security disability benefits?

A. When parents work and pay Social Security taxes, they earn credits that count toward their own and their family's Social Security protection. How old you are and how long you worked will determine if your child qualifies for benefits.

To find out more information about children's benefits, contact Social Security on 1-800-772-1213.

What to do when parents can't cope

Providence Journal

PROVIDENCE, R.I. – For Merilyn de Vos, the moment came the day her mother was found unconscious in her apartment, bleeding internally from ulcers so severe she needed six units of blood.

For Barbara Scott, the most telling sign was that her mother forgot how to use the television remote control.

For Jeri Belisle, it all started when her mother came to spend the winter because she was dependent on oxygen and feared power outages.

These three women, in different ways, reached a crossroads that nearly everyone faces one day or another – the moment when you realize your parent can no longer manage alone.

Sometimes the burden accumulates gradually, as your parent's needs grow bit by bit. Sometimes it crashes down amid a crisis. But after it happens, for better or worse, your life will change dramatically. And though the financial and logistical travails of arranging for care can be daunting, at times they are dwarfed by the emotional issues.

"We don't have a word for it, but it's a whole new life cycle," says Kathleen M. McKeon, associate director of the Rhode Island Department of Elderly Affairs. There's no Dr. Benjamin Spock for those who are taking care of their parents, McKeon says, no authority to guide people thrown into this new role, which resembles parenting yet is different in so many ways.

"We're an aging society," says Sandra Romano, the lead social worker for home care at the Roger Williams Medical Center in Providence. "There will be more and more people in their 80s and 90s. Yet we are not equipped as a society to deal with that. We need to teach each other what to do."

The first lesson often involves learning when it's time to intervene – and how to do so diplomatically.

"One needs to be constantly observing what's happening with parents," says Susan W. Graefe, a clinical social worker in Warwick who specializes in working with the elderly. "Not necessarily saying anything about it, but watching.

"There are right moments," Graefe advises. "The right moments are when you see the parent or hear the parent being vulnerable – when the parent says, 'I'm really having a hard time managing this house.'"

If your parent is not taking needed medication, forgets to pay bills, has lost a great deal of weight or has abandoned personal hygiene or housekeeping, these are signs that he or she may need help.

But McKeon cautions against overreacting to unimportant changes, such as when a once-dapper parent starts dressing casually, or even sloppily. "If he's lost the desire to have a shirt and tie on, that is not a big deal," she says.

"The rule of thumb," said Edward Zesk, executive director of Aging 2000, a nonprofit agency concerned with health care for the elderly, "is that you know you need help if you're worried about the health and safety of a family member."

Merilyn de Vos worried about the health and safety of her mother, but her mother refused to see a neurologist or seek other services. An only child who lived in Massachusetts, de Vos decided to wait for a crisis to develop.

She had no idea that a crisis was already brewing. Her mother had begun drinking, perhaps to ease her anxiety at the early signs of dementia. But the drinking gave her ulcers, and to treat the pain, she took aspirin in huge quantities. De Vos learned later that her aunt had provided the wine as well as the aspirin.

"I had no idea how serious the problem had become," de Vos said. "My aunt had been climbing ladders to bang on the windows to rouse my mother to get her to open the door."

One day, de Vos's mother could not be roused, and rescue workers had to break down the door. They found her collapsed and bleeding internally. De Vos realizes now that the drinking was so out of character for her mother – "a lady of such refinement" – that the possibility of drunkenness never crossed de Vos's mind. To take hold than if the parent can come to a decision pretty much on their own," Graefe says.

Power of attorney can be durable

Jan Collins and Jan Warner

Q. My sister has a durable power of attorney for our older sister, who's now in early stages of Alzheimer's. She handles all her financial affairs.

If skilled nursing care is required, even against our ill sister's wishes, does the power of attorney apply?

A. A durable power of attorney for financial matters is not the same as a durable power of attorney for health care matters unless, as is the case in a few states, some of both purposes can be included in one document.

Remember: the word "durable" means that the authority vested by the power of attorney continues after incapacity. People in the early stages of Alzheimer's may or may not be too incompetent to make their decisions.

If there is a dispute over how your sister will be cared for, then there will have to be a court proceeding through which a judge will decide if your sister is incapable of making her own decisions. And if she is, someone will be appointed to make the decisions for her under the guidance of the court.

Q. Like many of us who divorce, I found myself moving back with my parents to help them through their final years.

Through years of hard work, they accumulated assets including a home, some stock, and savings that they wanted me to have, especially since I gave up my job to care for them.

My father died from cancer three years ago. His treatment was fully covered by Medicare and Medigap insurance. My mother, who was diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease, now requires fulltime long-term care. I was shocked to find that her illness is not covered by Medicare or her other insurance, and that her assets will have to be "spent down" to poverty level in order for her to be entitled to Medicaid. This doesn't seem fair to her or to me. Why should cancer be covered and Alzheimer's not? What can I do?

A. We recently read that our health care system is nothing more than "a morbid lottery in which the illness one happens to get determines who will or won't go bankrupt."

With more than one-fourth of those over age 65 entering nursing homes, this is a sad state of affairs. That's why there must be planning before the fact when there are still options. Studies show that senior citizens are spending an average of more than 17 percent of their incomes on out-of-pocket health care expenses, as opposed to about 10 percent in 1961.

Medicaid planning involves the restructuring of a family's holdings so that the older family members who need long-term care can secure Medicaid benefits and family assets can be preserved for the surviving healthy family members. We suggest that you contact an attorney well-versed in elder law to help you decide what you can do, if anything, at this late date.

Q. About a year ago, my wife and I, both 65, had an attorney establish a living trust agreement for us. We then transferred most of our assets into this trust except for our home, car, and checking account. The total value of our estate is less than $600,000. What effect will this living trust have regarding Medicaid if we ever need it?

A. None. Under the current system, the only time you will find you qualify for Medicaid is when you are effectively bankrupt.

Generally, a living trust can help your survivors avoid the delay and cost of probate and keep your family business private at your death; however, you can accomplish many of the same things in other ways, including a jointly-held property with the right of survivorship.

But planning to avoid probate is a bad idea if a nursing home stay is on the horizon because, since you still control where your income goes and how your assets will be disposed of, a living trust will not help you with, and generally hinders, Medicaid planning.

When you begin to plan, it's best not to do it piecemeal, but in as flexible fashion as possible. You should consider not only probate expense, but also retirement, estate, health care planning, and long-term care issues simultaneously.
